PREFACE

The endeavours of Th. Aufrecht in his "Beiträge zur Kenntniss indicher Dichter"[1] and F. W. Thomas in his Introduction to the Kavīndravacana-samuccaya[2] to give a list of poets quoted in different subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s have proved to be very useful for our closer acquaintance with the literature of ancient and mediaeval India. These poets would have been completely unknown to us if their names and verses had not been preserved in the Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s of 'Greater India'.

The aim of the present Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha is to continue to a much larger extent the work begun by Otto Böhtlingk who in three big volumes collected, edited and translated into German 7613 verses (he called them Sprüche; but I prefer to call them subhāṣita-s), as well as of Th. Aufrecht and F. W. Thomas who gave lists of authors quoted in various subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s with indications where they occurred.

It has been emphasized several times before that "an up-to-date compendium containing all the known subhāṣita-s arranged in an alphabetical order is still a necessity".[3] The opinion has also been expressed several times that if anthologies in Sanskrit were to be exploited in any significant manner for the study of the history of Sanskrit literature (the importance of the subhāṣita-s for the history of Sanskrit literature is widely admitted), comprehensive indices and concordances of all the available anthologies would have to be prepared; they would also provide a compass to those who navigate in the ocean of subhāṣita literature.[4] The present Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha is intended to fill this gap.

The work on the present Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha was started in 1966 and the first volume is appearing only today. First, extensive indices of subhāṣita-s were to be prepared and then only could the editing of individual subhāṣita-s be started. By now, eight and a half volumes, containing some 18.000 subhāṣita-s beginning with letters अ to न, are ready for printing ; it may be assumed that the entire Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha will have to be published in some twenty volumes, plus additional volumes for verses which came to be known to me (or in the course of the preparation of the following volumes will come to be known to me) from sources either not published at the time when I started the work[1] or from subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s preserved only in manuscripts which I did not have at my disposal at that time[2] or several subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, the existence of which came only recently to my notice.

The present Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha is based on all the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, available to me, which are mentioned in the Introduction below.[3] At the beginning of each volume the list of authors quoted in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s is given and at the end a subject index, since the subhāṣita-s are quoted in alphabetical order and not according to subject matters. The alphabetical system seems to be particularly convenient for philological studies and for the easier finding of the subhāṣita-s[4], provided that a subject index is also attached[5] for those who want to find references to a specific topic and particularly for non-specialists who may find the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha useful for the study of Indian civilisation.

As mentioned in the Introduction (para 12.1), there exist three groups of subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s : (1) those composed virtually of sententious sayings ; (2) those composed virtually of quotations from literary works, particularly "beautifully turned" and eloquently said, as well as dealing with the description of nature, different moods, suggestions or anyokti-s and (3) mixed, i.e., including

2. E.g., in transcript Subhāṣitahārāvalī of Harikavi ; verses of this anthology could only be added beginning from Vol. III of the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha, since only then did I receive from BORI. the transcript of this subhāṣita-saṁgraha. Many of the other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s preserved in MSs. only were not yet made available to me. In the latter part of of the present volume I was able, while making corrections of proofs, to insert references to SH with the new numeration, as adopted in my On the Subhāṣitahārāvalī..., cf. fn. 3 on p. lxxx below.

3. With some exceptions mentioned below.

4. Cf. D. B. Diskalkar, (cf. fn. 1 on p. lxxii) : p. 241 ; A. Weber, Review of O. Böhtlingk's Indische Sprüche, second edition in Weber's Indische Skizzen III : p. 123. For philological reasons beginnings of variant-readings are also noted with references to the appropriate subhāṣita-s, even if they are obviously wrong.

5. Cf. A. Weber's review of Böhtlingk's Indische Sprüche, Vol. I of the first edition in Weber's Indische Skizzen, II : p. 260.

both types of subhaṣita-s. The present Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha belongs to the third category and contains not only wise sayings, but also stray poetical verses. That seemed to me to be necessary, since most of the Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s belong to the third group of anthologies and one of the aims of the present work is to include in it, among others, all the verses quoted in the already known subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s.

All subhāṣita-s included in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are quoted and edited[1] in the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha, though some, from the poetical point of view, may not be considered as "subhāṣita-s". Not all subhāṣita-s found in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are wise sayings,[2] nor pure poetry,[3] but, being considered as useful by the compiler of a subhāṣita-saṁgraha, were included by him in his anthology[4] and therefore included in this Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha ; they should not, however, be included in an anthology of poetry par excellance.[5] Even not all "poetical subhāṣita-s" have a great poetical value and, thus, might be considered as "useless,"[6] but since they were already included in a subhāṣita-saṁgraha, they are also included in the present Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha. Also for the same reason some subhāṣita-s included in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, though incorrectly construed are reproduced in the present work.[7]

In addition to Sanskrit subhāṣita-s cited in Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, subhāṣita-s also from subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s known in 'Greater India',

6. That was already admitted by some Indian poets and was well expressed by Maṅkha in his Śrīkaṇṭhacarita (2.14) in the following words (No. 673 below) :

अत्यर्थवक्रत्वमनर्थकं या
शून्यापि सर्वान्यगुणैर्व्यनक्ति ।
अस्पृश्यतादूषितया तया किं
तुच्छश्वपुच्छच्छटयेव वाचा ॥

7. I did not wish to follow in the foot-steps of O. Böhtlingk who very often, may be even sometimes too often, corrected the readings of some subhāṣita s ; I preferred to leave even gramatically incorrect readings if there was no sufficient source material for their improvement. Cf. L. Sternbach, Revised Supplement to O. Böhtlingk's Indische Sprüche in Indologica Taurinensia, II.

if they were translations or adaptation of Sanskrit texts, were included in the present work, even if they are unknown today. Therefore, we find, for instance, in the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha verses from the Nītiśāstra of Masūrākṣa (e.g., No. 569), the original source of which is not known.

In addition to the subhāṣita-s included in the various subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, a great part of Sanskrit literature was studied by me and subhāṣita-s (wise sayings and some descriptive verses) from these works were culled and quoted in the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha.[1] The choice was made by me and I alone am responsible for the selection. I expect criticism in this respect and questions why I chose one verse and omitted another. Many of these criticisms will be well taken, but what is pleasing to one person does not need to be pleasing to another. All the criticisms will be welcomed and suggestions will be gladly received; the subhāṣita-s additionally suggested might then be added in the supplementary volume(s) with the name of the proposer.

The original plan of the work was to collect and critically edit the subhāṣita-s. The publisher insisted, however, that a translation of each verse should be supplied; he thought that the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha would also appeal to non-specialist whose knowledge of Sanskrit is limited. I reluctantly agreed to this suggestion, but felt that I alone would not be able, in view of the enormous task before me, to cope with both the collecting and editing as well as translating. Therefore, whenever I found an English translation of a subhāṣita, already prepared by a Sanskrit scholar, I included it in the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha[2]; subhāṣita-s which I particularly liked and especially those belonging to the collections of wise sayings attributed to Cāṇakya[3] (and which I started to translate already) I translated myself.[4] The remaining subhāṣita-s were translated by Mr. A. A. Ramanathan of the Adyar Library and Research Centre[5] who consented to translate them for the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha. I wish to present my wholehearted thanks to him for the work done.

1. However Veda-s, Upaniṣad-s, etc., as well as Buddhist and Jainistic texts were not taken into consideration. I do not have sufficient knowledge to deal with these texts, but do hope that in addition to the existing subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s (e.g., Vishva Bandhu's Vedaśastra-saṁgraha; see Intro. para 50.2 below) another Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha for these texts will appear one day.

2. The name of the translator is given in brackets at the end of the translation of each verse. See also fn. 4 below.

I also wish to express my infinite gratitude to Paṇḍit Dr. K. P. Aithal, at present Professor of Indology at the University of Heidelberg, for his gracious and valuable advice and help in the preparation of the present volume of the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha. His suggestions were always to the point and were readily accepted by me. I also take this opportunity to express my sincerest thanks to Dr. S. K. Chatterji, National Professor of India in Humanities ; Dr. R. N. Dandekar, Professor at the University of Poona ; Dr. Gauri Nath Shastri, former Vice-Chancellor, Sanskrit University, Vārāṇasī ; Dr. V. Raghavan, former Professor and Head of the Department of Sanskrit, University of Madras ; Prof. K. V. Sarma, Vishveshvaranand Institute, Panjab University ; and Dr. Vibhuti Narain Singh, former ruler of Banaras, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the All-India Kashiraj Trust, Vārāṇasī for providing me useful information and helping me otherwise, in various ways, in the production of this work. I am beholden to the late Ācārya Dr. Vishva Bandhu Śāstrī, former Joint Secretary and Director of the Vishveshvaranand Vedic Research Institute, who always supported me in my plan and endeavours relating to the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha and I am happy to add that I continue to receive the same help and encouragement from his worthy successor Principal Rala Ram. Śrī S. Bhaskaran Nair, Deputy Director, Vishveshvaranand Vedic Research Institute, has been my right hand in the matter of seeing the work through the press. I am extremely glad to note that the present work has been greatly benefitted by the expertise which he has brought to bear in its editorial processing and final presentation. Finally, I wish to express my thanks to the Vishveshvaranand Vedic Research Institute, Hoshiarpur and to M/s. Motilal Banarsidass, Delhi for accepting the manuscript of the present volume for publication, despite the high cost of printing and the rather cumbersome nature of the manuscript.

The Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha is construed in the following manner. Each subhāṣita has a serial number,[1] the text with the indication of the source follows ; for details on the latter the "Abbreviations" and Index of Authors and Sources of Individual verses (pp. 319-379) should be consulted. The sources are divided into three categories : primary sources, denoted by अ : secondary sources, denoted by आ ; and sources from 'Greater India' denoted by इ ; then variants are registered and the name of the metre used is given ;[2] and finally the English translation with the name of the translator in brackets at the end of the translation is supplied[1]. (For the bibliographical data of the translators the "Abbreviations" should be consulted).

1. As explained before, the numbers without an asterisk denote wise sayings, with one asterisk denote poetical or descriptive subhāṣita-s and with two asterisks denote such verses which are neither wise sayings nor poetical or descriptive subhāṣita-s and should not be included in an anthology of poetry, but were included in the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha only because they appeared in a subhāṣita-saṁgraha.

2. Verses without the mention of the metre are composed in śloka-s or anuṣṭup-s.

In each volume of the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha the following items are also included :

1. A list of abbreviations which serves also as a guide for bibliographical data of the sources quoted and on their translations.

2. An index of authors and sources of individual subhāṣita-s included in the volume. This list contains the minimum necessary information about each author or source cited, as well as bibliographical references to more detailed information about these authors and sources. At the end of each entry numbers of verses cited in the volume where the authors and/or sources are quoted is given, as well as (in brackets) the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s in which the appropriate subhāṣita occurs. This list might be of value for students of the history of Indian literature, since it will give references also to poets who are generally unknown and are quoted exclusively in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s.

3. An index of metres other than śloka-s or anuṣṭup-s, used in the subhāṣita-s quoted in the volume, the reference numbers of the corrupt metres being given in italics.

4. A subject index of the subhāṣita-s quoted in the volume. It is intended to prepare a collective subject-index of all the volumes on the completion of the Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha.

INTRODUCTION

Wise saying

1. The Sanskrit literature has reached its apogee in its didactic poetry with thousands of moral maxims, ethical teachings and wise sayings. This floating expression of sound judgments preserved in metrical form are mines of practical good sense and evidence the wisdom of the Hindus which elevated them to a high position among the nations of the globe.[1]

2. Indian authors displayed a profound knowledge of human nature with all the weaknesses and defects and have given sound moral advice with respect to various situations in which human beings were likely to wound up. These authors particularly believed that the present conduct of humans is a result of previous existence and therefore their present action will heavily bear on their future. Consequently these actions should be good and moral and thus bring happiness in future life. In order to help the individuals to conduct themselves properly they gave them moral and ethical advice, moral and ethical guidance and instruction in practical wisdom; that gave rise to the didactic literature with its wise sayings, advisory sentences and sententious maxims, as well as to the composition of innumeral pithy epigrams of proverbial philosophy—miniature word-paintings which contain deep thoughts masterly incorporated in two verse measures. They are scattered throughout the entire Sanskrit literature. These epigrams, aphorisms, wise sayings, maxims, adages, however quaintly expressed, contain the essence of some moral truths or practical lessons; they are drawn from real life and give the fruit of philosophy grafted on the stem of experience; they furnish an index to the spirit of a nation and are the result of its civilisation. In India most of these wise sayings in poetical form mostly composed in śloka-s or anuṣṭubh-s, belonged to the mass of oral tradition; they were not assembled in any collections but floated freely in order to be quoted at any appropriate occasion by Indian intellectuals. They contained not only sententious precepts and beautiful thoughts but were also expressed in cultivated language, well and beautifully turned and eloquently said; they dealt with a variety of subjects and had as their object practical wisdom or a moral thought by entertaining examples as well as precepts; they carried both mood and suggestion even if quoted out of the context; they had often a tinge of poetry, the poetical skill being exhibited in the intricate play of words which created a slight wit, humour or satire ; they arose laughter, scorn, compassion and other moods. Often these short pieces of excellent poetry written by known poets and containing universal truths became generally adopted as wise and pleasing expression of verity, so that ultimately their authorship was forgotten and they became authorless. These are subhāṣita-s or sūkti-s—sayings, epigrams, sententious precepts, didactic teachings.

1. Cf. L. Sternbach, Subhaṣita-saṁgraha-s: A Forgotten Chapter of the Histories of Sanskrit Literature in Indologica Taurinensia I. 169-255. (Although this article appeared before the present Introduction, it was based on the latter).

3. According to Buddhist teachings subhāṣits-s were well spoken words "filled with dhamma and not with adhamma" ; they were spoken in a pleasant manner and not unppleasant manner and they spoke the truth and not the untruth.[1]

Different kinds of sayings

4. From the sententious precepts three other types of sayings must be discerned, viz. (1) quotations from literary Sanskrit works of authors known or unknown being either descriptive verses or single poetical verses standing by itself in which the poet by means of a few strokes depicted a single phase of emotion or a single interesting situation within the limit of a finely finished form ; (2) popular maxims or adages ; and (3) proverbs.

4.1. The quotations from literary sources, also "beautifully turned" and eloquently said (subhāṣita-s, sūkti-s) were often quoted at the king's court. The use of such quotations in conversations proved that the person who cited them was knowledgeable in Sanskrit literature and an erudite.

4.2. The popular maxims and adages— sūtra-s, were short simple unadorned sayings, not construed in poetical form, but containing some wise observations handed down from antiquity ; they were usually attributed to a known personality, e.g., to Bṛhaspati, to Cāṇakya and others and, hence, became known as Bārhaspatya-sūtra-s, Cāṇakya-sūtra-s, etc.

4.3. The proverbs—lokokti-s (also called lokavākya-s, prācīnavākya-s, etc.) were short sentences which expressed a well-known truth or common fact ascertained by experience or observation and often repeated; they were also not constructed in poetical form.

5.1. A subhāṣita containing a sententious precept is for instance a quotation from the Vyāsa-subhāṣita-saṁgraha (85)[2] saying :

उत्साहो रिपुवन् मित्रम् आलस्यं मित्रवद् रिपुः ।
अमृतं विषवद् विद्या वनिताऽमृतवद् विषम् ॥

1. Suttanipāta 3. Mahavagga 450.

2. Also quoted in Sūktiratnahāra 236 where it is attributed to Pratāparudra.

(Zeal, though it appears to be hostile, is like a friend; indolence, though it takes a form of a friend, is an enemy; learning, though it appears to be unpalatable like poison, is nectar; (and) women, though they are poison, are pleasing like nectar).

5.2. A subhaṣita containing a descriptive verse written by an anonymous author appears for instance in Vallabhadeva's Subhāṣitāvali (1850), where it reads :

संकोचितकरयुगल:
प्रगलितदृङ्नासिकोद्धूषितकाय: ।
नद्यवतरणविषण्णो
लिखित इवावस्थित: पथिक: ॥

(Both hands clenched,/running eyes and nose/and shivering skin:/as if in a painting,/the traveller stands on the river-bank/despairing how to get across)[1].

5.3. A subhaṣita containing a poetical verse standing by itself, depicting a single emotion is, for instance, a verse often quoted[2] which says :

संगमविरहविकल्पे
वरमिह विरहो न संगमस् तस्या: ।
संगे सैव तथैका
त्रिभुवनमपि तन्मयं विरहे ॥

(Pure logic may convince a lover's heart/that ampler blessings flow when we're apart. When she is here, my lady is but one : when she's away, in all things I see her alone).[3]

5.4. A popular maxim (sūtra) is, for instance, a sentence from the Caṇakya-sutrāṇi (328) which says : अपराधानुरूपो दण्ड : ("Punishment must be proportionate to the offence") and a proverb (lokokti) is, for instance, an axiom quoted in the Laukikanyāyāñjali which says : अहृदयवचसामहृदयमुत्तरम् "Heartless words get heartless answers").

Subjects dealt with in the sayings

6. Probably no other literature of the world can be compared with Sanskrit literature as far as the variety of subjects dealt with in short epigrams is concerned. Sanskrit poets cultivated poetry to such an extent that every work, whether on love or hate, life or death, but even on law, philosophy, logic, medicine, horses or manure was written in verse. The condensation of thought in a short verse was masterly performed and epigrams on different subjects of life are found in almost all poetical works. They were composed in verse because their shortness and condensed nature made it easier to a common reader to commit them to memory.

Forms of sayings

7. Subhaşita-s and sūkti-s were usually construed in a four pāda verse—a śloka or an anuṣṭubh—where a thought, a truth, was condensed in four pāda-s. But not always so. Sometimes two pāda-s or even one pāda proclaimed a truth and two or three pāda-s illustrated this truth by an example or with an episode from Sanskrit literature : Purāṇa-s, epics, etc. So, for instance, Kṣemendra's Cārucaryāśataka and its imitation Dyā Dviveda's Nītimañjarī, Kusumadeva's Dṛṣṭāntaśataka, Gumāni's Upadeśaśataka or Purāṇārthasaṁgraha were construed.

7.1. We find an example of a four pāda verse containing one thought in verses quoted above. To illustrate a second kind of subhāṣita a verse from the Dṛṣṭāntaśataka of Kusumadeva (60)[1] is quoted ; we read there :

असंभवगुणस्तुत्या जायते स्वात्मनस्त्रपा ।
कर्णिकारं सुगन्धीति वदन् को नोपहस्यते ॥

(Who praises merits which do not exist is ashamed afterwords of oneself ; who will not be ridiculed who says that the karṇikara-flower[2] has sweet smell), or a verse from the Purāṇārthasaṁgraha (Rajanīti 130) which says :

अभिशप्तः पुण्यकार्ये प्रवृत्तोऽपि न सिद्धिभाक् ।
भर्त्रनुगमनोद्युक्ता रेणुका जनमारिका ॥

(An accursed person does not attain good results though he be engaged in good works ; Reṇukā, trying to accompany her husband became the destroyer of the world).

Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s

8. The most famous and well known subhāṣita-s containing sententious sayings, which belonged to the floating mass of oral tradition, were probably strung together like beads on a necklace in the beginning of the Christian era ;

1. Also quoted in the Subhāṣita-ratna-bhaṇḍāgāra 168.695 and the Subhaṣita-sudha-ratna-bhaṇḍāgāra 502.695.

2. Pterospermum acerifolium, known for its bad smell, then they were also attributed in majorem gloriam to a well known author; so probably Bhartṛhari's epigrams and the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings became known.

9. On the other hand, beginning from the tenth century A. D. many authors understanding that subhāṣita-s developed literary ability and good taste, were teaching right behaviour of cultured men and possibly also, in order to save them from disappearance had connected different wise sayings and/or descriptive verses of known to them contemporary or earlier poets and included them in collections of subhāṣita-s, anthologies of Sanskrit poetry, which were called koṣa-s, subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and a variety of similar names. A koṣa is defined in the Sāhityadarpaṇa (6.308) as:

कोषः श्लोकसमूहस् तु स्याद् अन्योन्यानपेक्षकः।
व्रज्याक्रमेण रचितः स एवाऽतिमनोरमः ॥

(A compilation of verses, independent of one another and arranged according to divisions (vrajya-s); this is particularly beautiful). In other words a subhāṣita-saṁgraha is a collection of stray verses composed by various poets and divided according to subject matters; how that division has to be done depended on the compiler of the collection. There exist hundreds of such subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s of which only a few were edited.

10. Although the arrangement of the different subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s depended on the individuality of the compilers, their contents is stereotyped[1] and the verses quoted are often identical, since the compilers drew often upon similar sources. Several subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are divided according to the three or four puruṣārtha-s and deal with dharma, artha, kāma and, in some instances, also with mokṣa. The first Prākrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, the Sūktiratnahāra, the Subhāṣita-sudhā-nidhi and some Tamil anthologies (e.g., the Nalaṭiyār and the Tiru-k-kural) are so divided. The division of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and some collections of stray verses based on these epigrams is similar; these collections are divided into three parts—nīti (dharma and artha), vairāgya (dharma and mokṣa) and śṛṅgāra (kāma and artha).

11.1. The subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s deal with different themes and one is often impressed by the polarity of views on the same subject and paradoxes expressed differently in the subhāṣita-s included in them. On the one hand we are taught to live a carefree and passionate life, on the other self-control and self-abnegation[2]. A characteristic feature of the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s is namely

1. The subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s deal, in particular, with general rules of proper behaviour for intercourse among men, with general reflections on worldly wisdom and duty, with women, love, fate, fame, human efforts, richness and poverty, flattery of kings, etc.

2. Bhartṛhari's Śataka-s No. 85.

the variety of moods and descriptions of different aspects of life, sometimes in glaring extremes, while the truth always lies between the extremes. Often both sides of a subject, as well as the middle, are described vividly and convincingly. And so we find for instance on one occasion the description of women in laudatory terms and on the other occasion in deprecatory terms. We read on the one side that :

प्रजनार्थं महाभागाः पूजार्हा गृहदीप्तयः ।
स्त्रियः श्रियश्च गेहेषु न विशेषोऽस्ति कश्चन ॥

(there is no difference whatsoever between the Goddess of good fortune and women who are destined/to bear children, who secure many blessings, who are worthy of reverence and who brighten the household)[1] and on the other that :

अनृतं साहसं माया मूर्खत्वम् अतिलुब्धता ।
अशौचत्वं निर्दयत्वं स्त्रीणां दोषाः स्वभावजाः ॥

(falsehood, hastiness, deceit, senselessness, covetousness, uncleanliness and cruelty are the inborn faults of women)[2]

because women :

संमोहयन्ति मदयन्ति विडम्बयन्ति
निर्भर्त्सयन्ति रमयन्ति विषादयन्ति ।
एताः प्रविश्य सदयं हृदयं नराणां
किं नाम वामनयना न समाचरन्ति ॥

(what do not fair-eyed women do into the tender heart of men ? they befool, they enchant, they mock, they threaten, they delight and they drive into despair)[3]

11.2. For each occasion we find among subhaṣita-s appropriate verses of different poets (but sometimes even of the same poet) who composed conflicting verses for conflicting occasions.[4]

4. Cf. D.B. Diskalkar, Subhaṣita-s in Inscriptions in JOIB 11.3: p. 239 sqq.

11.3 Some subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are peculiar as far as their contents are concerned; they contain also "useful" information which can under no circumstances be considered as poetical, didactic or "well turned" verses; some of these verses deal, for instance, with gardening, manure, swords, archery, etc. Such a subhāṣita-saṁgraha is the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati where we find, for instance, a verse (2255) saying:

उष्णं जलं क्षिपेत् तत्र मात्रा नास्तीऽह कस्यचित् ।
पक्षैकं स्थापिते भाण्डे कोष्णस्थाने मनीषणा ।
कुणपस् तु भवेद् एव तरूणां पुष्टिकारकः ॥

(into the ingredients consisting of flesh, fat, etc., of fish, hogs and other animals, one should add hot water to the extent required: this should be kept in a vessel for a fortnight in a lukeworm place by the wise: this becomes the manure kuṇapa which richly nourishes plants). It is clear that this verse was composed neither for the development of literary ability, nor for teaching right behaviour of cultured men, but was composed in order to teach all kinds of useful information, the more so as we find quite a number of verses of that sort in this subhāṣita-saṁgraha; it was composed as an encyclopaedic work for everyday use of worldly life.

Different Kinds Of Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s

12.1. Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s can be divided into three groups: (1) subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s composed virtually only of sententious sayings; (2) subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s composed virtually only of quotations from literary works, particularly "beautifully turned" and eloquently said, as well as dealing with the description of nature, different moods, suggestions or anyokti-s; and (3) subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s mixed, i.e., including both types of subhāṣita-s.

12.2. The sententious sayings were mostly construed in śloka-s or anuṣṭubh-s, while the descriptive and other "beautifully turned" verses were mostly construed in longer metres, since these metres are better suited to this type of poetry; therefore the first group of subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s is mostly composed of śloka-s or anuṣṭubh-s and the second group of verses written in āryā, vasantatilakā, śikhariṇī, śārdūlavikrīḍita and other longer metres.

Importance of Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s

13.1. The subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s which form a valuable, but at the same time, inappreciated and sunk into oblivion branch of Sanskrit literature, are particularly important from the point of view of the history of Sanskrit literature, and from the point of view of the light which they throw on the Indian way of life and thought. In particular, subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s preserve ancient thought and moral teaching, as well as, preserve smaller and less known Sanskrit poets whose works were lost[1]. Many of the Sanskrit poets would not have been known to us even by name, if they and their stray verses would not be quoted in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s. Also some parts of literary works of already known authors, which otherwise would not have been known to us, are often preserved in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s. We also find there sometimes some passages from well-known works not preserved in the MSs. which are available to us[2]. Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are also important for chronological reasons, since they are mostly dated and in this way provide information as to the date ad quem poets, named by them, lived (e.g., a poet named in an anthology from the thirteenth century A.D. must have lived before that date or be contemporaneous with the author of the anthology).

13.2 Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s have also an enormous poetical and educative value, even if they belong to a comparatively late period and even if the verses quoted in them are anonymous, since they teach us what was considered as right behaviour among cultured people of India and as such constitute a code of good conduct applied in ancient India ; they depict vividly the spirit of an age, the task and ability during various periods, country life, life in the village, different occupations of men and women, their habits and manners, activities, etc. sometimes better and with deeper insight than the quotations from kāvya-s and epics. The subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s do not preserve only the floating mass of oral tradition,

2. "lost passages" of the Mānava-dharmaśāstra are preserved in the Ślokāntara, an Old Javanese subhāṣita-saṁgraha. Cf. L. Sternbach. Sanskrit Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s in Old-Javanese and Tibetan in ABORI XLIII. pp. 115-58 (see pp. 126-7 and 151).

the current wise sayings, but also excellent poetry: they are real gems of poetical expression with minute descriptions of everything that was worth noting and describing; they are like sparks and, on account of the terseness of their expression and their striking, but easily comprehensive, imaginary they drive home the ancient truths, which have become almost banal, with a fresh impact. Subhāṣita-s included in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are storehouses of information written in beautiful language about the life of the common people of India between the eleventh and nineteen century. This information, easily available in these collections can only be found there, since the other sources of Indian literature describe rather the life of kings, Brahmaṇa-s and nobles.

Contents of Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s

14. We can assume that not all subhāṣita-s included in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s were originally put there by the compiler of the subhāṣita-saṁgraha, particularly, if it is preserved in one MS only. It is known that the scribes liked to add to the text wise sayings which were similar to those quoted before; if, for instance, the original subhāṣita-saṁgraha quoted two or three verses dealing with wealth, its good and bad sides, the scribes were likely to add other subhāṣita-s from the floating mass of oral tradition dealing with the same subject, since many subhāṣita-s must have been known to him[1].

Ascriptions in Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s

15. A large majority of verses included in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are anonymous but often are ascribed to poets or poems, Usually these ascriptions are reliable and as such are very useful for the reconstruction of the critical text of the said work; particularly the reconstruction of non-uniform texts, such as the Purāṇa-s can be greatly facilitated by the use of texts preserved in the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and specifically attributed to a given Purāṇa, the more so as we usually can date and place the texts of the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and thus know in what form it was current in a certain time and, possibly, at a certain place.[2]

16. If quotations in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are ascribed to a certain work and are written in the style, language and spirit of the said work and are not

1. That was, in particular, noted in the kathā literature where different texts and, particulary different younger versions of a particular kathā-work became swollen by various subhāṣita-s dealing with the same subject, due to interpolations made by scribes or compilers of younger versions. Cf. L. Sternbach, The kāvya-portions in the kathā-literature; An Analysis, vol. I.: pp. 27 and 60.

2. Cf. L. Sternbach, Purāṇic Texts in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s; 1. the Khaḍgalakṣaṇādhyāya of the Viṣṇudharmottara: 2. Mārkaṇḍeya-purāṇa in the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati in Purāṇa 13.2: pp. 102-132.

found in any of the MSs. of that work they should also be taken into consideration in the reconstruction of that work, as possibly forming part of it; they could have been "lost" or purposely omitted from the original text by some scribes.[1] We find, for instance, in the Subhāṣitaratnahāra some verses attributed to the Kauṭilīya-Arthaśāstra[2] which we do not find in any texts of this arthaśastra; it is possible that they originally belonged to this work, since they are written in the style and language of this treatise and are construed in its spirit[3], or are a variant[4] of another work (i.e., the Mānava-dharmaśāstra in a form very different from the usually accepted text of this dharmaśastra[5]).

17. The subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s do not give us always the names of the authors of the individual verses; often they may only say that "somebody" is their author; sometimes they say that the verse was taken from a specific work, e.g., the Mārkaṇḍeya-purāṇa; and sometimes they ascribe a verse to a mythical poet, e.g., to Vyāsa, that does not mean necessarily that it was taken from the Mahābhārata; and sometimes they give only the epithet or the by-name of the poet. The ascription of authorship of a verse to an individual poet or work is not always reliable; we very often notice that in one subhāṣita-saṁgraha a given verse is ascribed to one poet and in another subhāṣita-saṁgraha to another poet. Some verses quoted in different subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are even sometimes attributed to six different poets. Sometimes these poets are entirely different, but sometimes only some letters of probably the same name were changed, e.g., Solloka or Solhoka, or Sohloka, or Sohṇoka or Sonhoka and sometimes we have to wonder whether the verse was, for instance, ascribed to Silhaṇa or to Bilhaṇa, or whether Silhaṇa was the same person as Bilhaṇa.

18. Sometimes also different scribes of the same work added different ascriptions to the same verse; therefore we find, for instance, that in one MS of the same subhāṣita-saṁgraha[6] a verse is ascribed to one author, while in another MS of the same anthology the verse is ascribed to another author.

1. It must be however realised that the ascriptions to a given work might be wrong. See below.

2. This arthaśāstra as preserved to our days is known only in one recension and variants are usually unimportant, but sometimes new variants occur in this anthology; they might be very useful for the reconstruction of a critical text.

3. Cf. L. Sternbach, Some Unknown Stanzas attributed to Kauṭilya in University of Rajasthan Studies (Hindī and Sanskrit) (1967-68): pp. 1-5 and An Additional Note on "Some Stanzas attributed to Kauṭilya" ibid No. 5 for 1970-71; pp. 15-17.

4. Or paraphrase.

5. Cf. Sūktiratnahāra 87. 1-2 (mantra-deśa); Manava-dharmaśāstra 7.149 and 7.147.

6. E.g., in the Padyāvalī of Rūpa Gosvāmin or in the Subhāṣita-ratnakoṣa.

19. With regard to ascriptions to works and not to individual poets, some subhaṣita-saṁgraha-s often mix up the best known works, e.g., the Mahābhārata with the Rāmāyaṇa, or the Mānava-dharmaśāstra and even sometimes with the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings, thus proving that, particularly in these cases, the compiler of the particular subhāsita-saṁgraha did not quote the verse from the original but from his memory which, as so often in this case also, let him down ; he could have also been misled by tradition.

20. Wrong ascriptions to different authors, mostly in modern subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, are often due to the carelessness of the editors. Sometimes the first pāda is identical in several subhāṣita-s while the next pāda-s are not ; if the editor did not take enough care to check the whole verse with the original he often made mistakes in ascribing the particular verse to the right poet or work.[1]

21. Despite these shortcomings the ascriptions of verses quoted in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s to different poets are of great value and we can assume with a great degree of certainty that if a verse was ascribed in more than one subhāṣita-saṁgraha to a particular author[2] and if it was not ascribed in another subhāṣita-saṁgraha to a different author, it was really composed by this poet.

Wise sayings in other works than Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s

22. Since Indian authors were very fond of quoting wise sayings and moral teachings, they did not only cite them in the various anthologies, but also have woven them into some of their literary works, in particular into the kathā-literature. Most of the collection of fables have been written in order to teach young princes worldly wisdom, the science of proper conduct (nītiśastra) and are therefore full of subhāṣita-s. Also another branch of Sanskrit literature contains innumerable subhāṣita-s and sūkti-s but rather in the form of quotations from other literary works than moral sayings. These are the works on poetics, rhetorics and dramaturgy, the authors of which in order to illustrate the points of their teachings, rasa-s, etc. quoted verses from various poetical works of authors not only known to us, but often unknown authors whose works became lost. The Sāhitya-śastras and the Alaṁkāra-s can often be also considered as subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s composed of illustrative verses. Even some commentaries like the Mahābhāṣya of Patañjali are storehouses of subhāṣita-s.

1. Many such examples could be quoted, e.g., in the Subhāṣita-ratna-bhāṇḍāgāra.

2. If two subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s are independent anthologies. For instance, if a verse is ascribed to the same author in the Subhāṣita-ratna-bhāṇḍāgāra and the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati we still are not certain whether this verse was really composed by the given author, because the Subhāṣita-ratna-bhāṇḍāgāra quotes uncritically the ascriptions found in the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati.

23. Subhāṣita-s are found in the Sanskrit literature from the earliest times. Sententious verses occur already in the Ṛgveda[1], in great number in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa[2], in the gāthā-s, in the Brāhmaṇa-s, in the Upaniṣad-s, in the epics and in the dharmaśāstra-s. The oldest subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s known to exist in India are Hāla's Sattasaī, Jayavallabha's Vajjālagga and the Chapaṇṇaya Gāhāo[3].

Oldest Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s in Prākrit.

24.1. Hāla's Sattasaī (Skt. Saptaśatī, popularly known as Gāhākośo or Gāthākośa or Gāthāsaptaśatī[4]) seems not to be a work of a single writer, as was often adduced, but a compilation of different verses, mostly lyric verses, which give in particular varied and charming expression to the emotion of love, well selected by Hāla, who as a gifted compiler and redactor polished some of them himself and gave them the final poetical touch for the first time.[5]

Also the earlier collections of moral sayings, such as the didactic works of Amitagati (the Subhāṣitaratnasaṁdoha and Dharmaparīkṣā (10th and the beginning of the 11th century) and Hemacandra's Yogaśāstra belong to the early subhāṣita literature ; they expound the teachings of Jainism.

24.2. There are seven different recensions of the Sattasaī which differ one from another with regard to the form of the text, the order of verses and textual subject matter. The number of verses in these recensions amounts usually to 700 but sometimes even to 1006 verses,[1] but only 430 verses—gāthā-s (musical stanzas)[2] appear in all the recensions; most of the remaining verses are probably interpolations, many of them by scribes who knowing the popularity of Hāla's work, added verses of the same theme which they knew by heart.

24.3. Hāla was often identified with king Śātavāhana (Śālivāhana, or Sālavāhaṇa, etc.) ruling in Pratiṣṭhāna in the Aśmaka country on the bank of Godāvarī and husband of Līlāvatī, the daughter of king Silāmegha of Siṁhala island[3]. His work was written in Prākrit, or specifically in Māhārāṣṭrī dialect[4] current in the Mahārāṣṭra, the land of Marāṭha-s[5], between the Vindhya mountains and the Godāvarī river.[6] The Sattasaī was possibly from the second century A.D. but probably from the period between A D. 200 and 600.[7]

24.4. Hāla, by means of a few strokes, depicted the life and character of the villagers of Mahārāṣṭra with all their virtues and vices, their family life, their religious and social customs, including marriages and other ceremonies peculiar to the various castes and, above all, their sex-life and sex-relations, often frankly and sensuously, as well as the land on which they lived, with rivers, valleys, mountains, vegetations and fauna.

24.5. The gatha-s, intended to be sung, contain poetry of the highest type. They are written in poetical language, and not necessarily in the language of the common people. Each gatha forms a unity in itself and only in some cases two or three gatha-s are combined and form a song. Not infrequently a gatha forms an epigram or an aphorism where a certain truth is expressed in few words; very seldom gatha-s contain well-rounded narrative verses from another poem or drama. The verses, as Hāla himself stated in the third verse of Sattasaī, were compiled from different sources and probably only the 430 verses common to all recensions, formed the nucleus of the original collection; a part of these verses were probably culled by Hāla from different poems with the addition of a great number of verses composed by himself.[1] Some of the commentators on the Sattasaī, of which they are fourteen from all over India, ascribed a great number of verses to different authors who lived until the eighth century A. D.[2]: Bhuvanapāla's commentary on Sattasaī alone[3] quoted 389 authors including, Hāla himself, but MSs. of the Sattasaī differ from one another in ascriptions of different verses to different authors.[4] The popularity of Hāla's work[5] inspired in the eleventh century Govardhana to imitate Hāla's gatha-s in Sanskrit ārya verses: he arranged them alphabetically; he called his work the Āryāsaptaśatī.[6] Although he wanted to throw into dark the fame of Hāla by composing some 700 verses with erotic themes, his rendering is inferior in poetic skill to Hāla's gatha-s. Bihārīlāl (or Vihārīlal) composed also in Hindī his Sat'saī basing himself on Hāla's work and Paramānanda wrote his Śṛṅgāra-saptaśatikā modelling it on Bihārīlāl's poem. On the model of Govardhana's Āryāsaptaśatī, Gopīnātha Miśra's Gopīnātha-saptaśatī, Mādhava Bhaṭṭa's Āryā-saptaśatī, Śrī Giridhara Sharma's Gāthā-saptaśatī, Śaivala Kavīśvara's Sundarīsaptaśati and Āryā-saptaśatī

Keith (HSL is of the opinion that "it is possible, even probable, that in its origin the Sattasaī was no mere anthology, but a carefull collection of verses largely his own or refashioned by himself—much as Burns refashioned some of his material—on the basis of older verses, and that in course of time by interpolation and change the collection lost much of its individuality"). Cf. S. V. Sohoni, Two Verses from Hāla's Gathasaptaśati in JOIB 19 ; 342-8 and idem, Verse No. 355 in Gā° in BORS 54.165-7.

by Viśveśvara of Almora[1] were composed[2]. Most of them are poor imitations of Hāla's work.

25.1. Another early Prākrit anthology is the Vajjālagga[3] (or Vajjālaggā, Vijjālaggam, Bhajjalaggam, Vidyālayam[4]) by Jayavallabha (Jayavallaha), a Śvetāmbara Jain[5] with a Sanskrit chāyā by Ratnadeva from the year 1393[6] : it was prepared at the instance of Dharmacandra, pupil of Haribhadrasūri, the successor as high priest of the Pṛthugaccha of Mānabhadrasūri.

25.2. The work is known to exist in two recensions : in both recensions it contains 1344 verses (692+652), of which only 449 are common to both recensions and 389 to all the MSs[7]. In the J. Laber's edition this anthology contains 795 verses (all in gāthā metre, including 5 introductory and 3 closing verses): the work is divided into 95 vajjā-s (Skt. vrajā-s or paddhati-s) according to the three puruṣārtha-s (dharma, artha and kāma), as was implicitly confirmed by the compiler (in gāthā 4): however only one third of the verses are gnomic and relate to dharma and artha: the rest is erotic in nature, sometimes with a double meaning even conferminous with pornography. The verses are not ascribed to individual authors. The work is an anthology par excellence as is clearly stated in verse 3[8]. The verses were not all written by Jain poets and by poets who belonged to Mahārāṣṭra[9]. The Vajjālagga is influenced by Hāla's Sattasaī and is also written in Māhārāṣṭrī[10].

25.3. The date of the Vajjālagga is unknown but it must have been composed not much later than Hāla's Sattasaī[1].

25.4. We find some common verses[2] in the Sattasaī and the Vajjālagga[3] as well as in newly discovered Prakrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha, probably from the fifth century A.D., the Chapaṇṇaya Gāhāo.[4] The Kuvalayamāla of Uddyotana-sūri (A.D. 778 or 779)[5] refers along with Hāla (called Sālāhaṇa)[6] and Pālittaya to Chappaṇṇaya who seems not to be an individual author, but a community of outstanding poets also known by the name of Vidagdhas[7] : this was probably group of 56 eminent poets (ṣaṭprajña) whose stray verses have survived in a subhāṣita-saṁgraha by the name of Setu,[8] compiled in the Vākāṭaka age (5th century). When this anthology lost its importance, some verses of it were incorporated in Hāla's Sattasaī.

26.1. The C h a p a ṇ ṇ a y a-g ā h ā o[?](or the Gāthākośa of Chapaṇṇaya) contains 164 gāthā-s in Jaina Mahārāṣṭrī with some verses in Apabhraṁśa. The original work was probably shorter and several verses were added later. This anthology is not divided according to puruṣārtha-s but some topics are grouped together. None of the verses are ascribed to individual authors[9].

Subhāṣita-saṁgraha in Sanskrit

27.1. The first genuine Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha, probably from the eleventh or twelfth century A.D. (1130) is the V i d y ā k a r a's S u b h ā ṣ i t a-r a t n a - k o ṣ a[10]. A fragment of this subhāṣita-saṁgraha was published on the basis of a fragmentary palm-leaf MS in 1912 in the Bibl. Ind. (No. 1309) by E. W. Thomas as the Kavīndravacanasamuccaya. F. W. Thomas wrote in the preface to this work that "It is not very likely that a second MS will ever be found to make good the deficiencies" : however the Subhāṣita-ratnakoṣa (which incorporated the Kavīndravacanasamuccaya) was edited on the basis of two MSs. : a palm-leaf codex from the Ngor monastery in Central Tibet, a comparatively modern paper MS of Khatmandu, as well as on the basis of F. W. Thomas' edition of the Kavīndravacanasamuccaya. The first MS. contains 1000 verses, the later 1728 verses and the Kavīndravacanasamuccaya 525 verses.

2. The wording is not always identical.

27.2. The Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa which contains 1739 subhāṣita-s is divided into fifty sections vrajyā-s of which the first six are devoted to different deities; the seventh deals with the sun, a lesser deity ; the eighth to thirteenth with different seasons ; the fourteenth to twenty-sixth with various aspects of love ; the twenty-seventh to thirty-first with description of day and night ; the remaining vrajyā-s deal with miscellaneous items. Very little space is devoted in this subhāśita-saṁgraha to nīti. Most of the verses are descriptive subhāṣita-s. The Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa quotes 223 authors and works.

28. Another text, containing also a part of the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa is an imitation of this anthology ; it is called Prasanna-sāhitya-ratnākara of Nandana. It is from the 15th century. This unpublished anthology is divided into vrajyā-s and, though incomplete, contains 1428 verses[1].

29.1. Also an old subhāṣita-saṁgraha, compiled in A.D. 1205 in Bengal is the Saduktikarṇāmṛta or Sūktikarṇāmṛta of Śrīdharadāsa[2]. It contains many verses which we also find in the also alternative readings, emendations, notes to each verse, corrections, an index of Sanskrit metres, of authors and subjects. A more popular edition of the same work appeared as Sanskrit Poetry from Vidyākara's Treasury, Cambridge, Mass. 1970.

2. The Saduktikarṇāmṛta was edited three times. The first edition by Mm. Pt. Rāmāvatāra Śarmā in Bibl. Ind. 217 (1912-21) is incomplete (only two fascicles appeared ; this is a partial critical edition. The second edition also by the same Paṇḍit with a critical introduction in English by Dr. Har Dutt Śarmā and in Sanskrit by Pt. Padam Singh Śarmā appeared in the Punjab Sanskrit Series, Vol. 15 (Lahore 1933) ; it is not a critical edition and is often faulty and its value is limited ; it is based on a single MS, although some others could have been available to the editor ; it does not contain a critical apparatus. A new and a more critical edition by S. C. Banerji, containing, however, a number of errors, appeared in 1965;

Subhāṣita-ratnakoṣa, as well as many verses of Bengālī poets, since both—Śrīdharadāsa and his father Vaṭudāsa—were in the service of king Lakṣmaṇasena of Bengal.

29.2. The Saduktikarṇāmṛta is divided into 5 pravāha-s (streams); each pravāha is subdivided into vīci-s (waves); each vīci contains five verses. Since there are 476 pravāha-s there should be 2380 verses, but several verses were omitted and therefore the actual number of verses in this anthology amount to 2370 and the number of authors quoted to 485. Most of the verses are descriptive subhāṣita-s.

30.1. Also from the thirteenth century (A.D. 1258) dates the Sūktimuktāvalī of Bhagadatta Jalhaṇa (or Jahlaṇa)[1]. The author was the son of Lakṣmīdhara; he worked in Southern India for the Yādava king Kṛṣṇa who came to the throne in 1247. The anthology is divided into 133 paddhati-s and contains 2790 verses; it quotes 240 authors and works; among the latter there are also other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, such as the Sūktiratnākara and the Sūktisahasra.

30.2. The Sūktimuktāvalī exists in two versions—a small and a large one. The first sections of the anthology contain useful information about poets and poetry; the others deal with happiness, charity, fate, wickedness, wisdom, separation, union, misfortune, love, service to the king, etc. Verses quoted in this anthology are both ethical and descriptive.

31.1. One of the best known subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s is the Ś ā r ṅ g a-d h a r a-p a d d h a t i[2]. It is said that it was compiled by Śārṅgadhara, son

2. The only edition of the Śārṅgadharapaddhati was published in BSS 37, Bombay 1888 (The Paddhati of Śārṅgadhara. A Sanskrit Anthology published by Peter Peterson. Only Vol. I. of this anthology appeared; Vol. II which was supposed to contain an introduction, various readings and notes unfortunately never appeared. This is not a critical edition though based on six MSs.). Th. Aufrecht also edited 264 verses quoted in six other MSs. on which or on some of which he based his study (Über die Paddhati von Śārṅgadhara in ZDMG 27: pp. 1-100). Böhtlingk ZDMG 27.626-38 and Th. of Dāmodara, grandson of Rāghava, the Rājaguru of Hammīrabhūpati of Śakambharī in the year A.D. 1363. Some scholars drew attention to a praśasti (verses 2-6) where Śārṅgadhara was called the son of Dāmodara and the grandson of Rāghavadeva who lived at the court of Hammīra, the Cāuvāṇa (Chauhān) king of Sākhabharī. If by this is meant Hammīra who reigned between A.D. 1262 and 1301, whose fame was sung in the Hammīra-kāvya and who was great patron of scholars, then the date of 1363 seems to be conceivable for his grandson[1].

31.2. The Śārṅgadahara-paddhadi is divided into 163 sections (paddhati-s), today containing only 4689 ethical and descriptive verses ; originally the anthology contained probably 6300 verses, since in verse 56 (2.44) the total number of verses is given as amouting to 6300. The Śārṅgadhara-paddhati is unlike other Sanskrit anthologies ; it does not contain merely a section of verses about poets, poetry, women and love, dharma, artha, kāma, etc.[2], but deals with different subject matters which usually should not be included in anthologies of "beautiful verses" we find there, in particular, practical advice such as about different kinds of horses, gardening, omina and portenda, swords, etc.

31.3. H.D. Sharma and J.B. Chaudhuri[3] have analysed the authorities quoted in this anthology. According to H.D. Sharma 282 authors and according to J.B. Chaudhuri 271 authors and 31 works are quoted there. Several verses have double authorship and two verses have more than double authorship. Śārṅgadhara, who himself was also a poet, but of no high standing, quoted often the names of poets and works ; not seldom, however, he attributed some verses to "somebody".

32. Almost identical with the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati is the B ṛ h a c c h a r ṅ g a d h a r a - p a d d h a t i (or Bṛhat-Śārṅgadhara-paddhati)[4]; this anthology can be cosidedred as an inflated version of the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati. It is divided into 588 prakaraṇa-s (of which 473 occur also in the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati) and contains 7586 verses, of which ten are in Prākrit. It is a comparatively late work (eighteenth century) since it contains extracts of the Aśvadhāṭi-kāya written by Jagannātha Paṇḍita who was the court poet of kings Sarfoji of Tanjore, 66 verses[1] were omitted in this anthology from the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati and 2563 were added. In the additional verses names of authors are rarely mentioned. The greatest part of the new verses (255) occur after verse 1171.

33.1. Very interesting, though poorly edited on the basis of one MS., is the South-Indian anthology the S ū k t i r a t n a h ā r a of S ū r y a K a l i ṅ g a r ā j a (Sūryapaṇḍita)[2]; this authorship is contested however[3]. In the form in which it is available today, it was probably compiled in the first half of the fourteenth century[4]. It contains 2327 mostly ethical verses and is divided into four parvan-s and each parvan into paddhati-s. This is probably the oldest Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha in which each parvan deals with one of the four puruṣārtha-s[5]. According to the editor of this anthology, the Sūktiratnahāra is "an ornament" to the Trivandrum Sanskrit Series; this is not an exageration; it is very valuable, particularly due to the fact that it quotes authors and works not quoted in most of the other anthologies, e.g., verses from Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra, Nītidviṣaṣṭikā, the Vyāsa-subhāṣita-saṁgraha, or such authors as Pratāparudra, Ravigupta, etc.[6]. It quotes 81 works and 57 aurhors, but the ascriptions are often wrong[7].

33.2. In 1968, Dr. K. Krishnamoorthy published a new anthology called S u b h ā ṣ i t a-s u d h ā-n i d h i by S ā y a ṇ a[8] which he placed in the fourteenth century A.D., since it contains an eulogy of Kampa who most likely died in 1355 A.D. Dr. K. Krishnamoorthy ends his "Introduction" with the statement that among the later writers who are indebted to this work very much, Sūryapaṇḍita, author of the Subhāṣitaratnahāra[9], deserves first mention.

34.1. It is quite possible that these two works, i.e., Sāyaṇa's Subhāṣitanidhi and the Sūktiratnahāra are one and the same work, of which the Sūktiratnahāra (but not in its printed text) is original, while the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi is either a copy of the Sūktiratnahāra with various additions and omissions or another version of the same text[1]. Both works are from the first half of the fourteenth century[2] and its author may well be Sāyaṇa, since it is unlikely that Sūrya Kaliṅgarāja, i.e., the Asādhāraṇa Mantrin of king Kulaśekhara (subordinate of the Pāṇḍya king Mārarvernam Kulaśekhara I, who reigned between 1268 and 1308, could have been the actual compiler of this anthology. It was probably only in majorem gloriam ascribed to him.

34.2. The arrangement of the two anthologies is identical; both are divided into four parvan-s each dealing with dharma, artha, kāma, and mokṣa and each parvan into paddhati-s; the paddhati-s are almost identical (i.e., their titles and contents, although the order of the verses is different) and both include, with some exceptions, the same subhāṣita-s. Particularly the contents of the two longest parvan-s, i.e., the artha- and dharma- parvan-s are similar.

34.3. That the texts of the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi and the Sūktiratnahāra are identical and that the compiler of the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi did not chose independently the material from primary sources but from the Sūktiratnahāra is particularly evident from the fact that if differing readings occur in the primary source and in the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi the readings adopted in the latter anthology follow the text of the Sūktiratnahāra and not the original source[3], as well as that both contain several identical verses composed in six and not four pāda-s; that is rather a rare occurrance since, as a rule, subhāṣita-s are composed in four and not six pāda-s. The Sūktiratnahāra seems to be more complete than the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi; in the Sūktiratnahāra we find ascriptions to primary sources in most of the verses, while that was not the case with the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi; wherever they occur in the latter they seem to be recopied from the Sūktiratnahāra.

35. Probably older than the Sūktiratnahāra and the Subhāṣitasudhānidhi is the Vyāsa-subhāṣita-saṁgraha[1]. Most of the verses of this anthology are quoted in the Sūktiratnahāra where they are often attributed to Vyāsaśataka. The anthology contains 98 verses in the main text and 12 in the footnotes. The verses are almost exclusively sententious sayings. None of the verses is attributed to any poet. This subhāṣita-saṁgraha was also known in Ceylon and Siām[2].

36. Of another type is the Nītimañjarī of Dyā Dviveda[3], son of Lakṣmīdhara and Lakṣmī, grandson of Atri of the house of Mukunda: it is a collection of 164 current gnomic and didactic verses, moral maxims or proverbs illustrated by Vedic legends and Vedic texts; it was composed in saṁvat 1550 (A.D. 1494). The moral teachings begin with some ethical maxims, followed by the commentary, the Vedic ṛca-s and finally the exegesis of these ṛca-s. Although every ethical maxim is versified, commented upon and elucidated by the explanation of the Vedic passages it is quite independent of one another, the Vedic references embedded in them follow the order of the divisional system of the Ṛgveda. Consequently, the verses are distributed among 8 aṣṭaka-s of the Ṛgveda. The verses fall under the four puruṣārtha-s of which 44 deal with dharma, 68 with artha, 53 with kāma and only 1 with mokṣa. Dyā Dviveda used for the interpretation of the Vedic passages Sāyaṇa's commentary on the Ṛgveda and therefore could not live before the end of the 14th and beginning of the 15th century. He mentions also the Mānava-dharmaśāstra, the Yājñavalkya-smṛti, the Mahābhārata, the Bhagavadgītā, the Hitopadeśa and Kṣemendra's Cārucaryā; the latter seems to be the model for the Nītimañjarī; twenty-three didactic parts of the

2. The Ceylonese Vyāsakāraya. In the 20th century it was brought from Ceylon during the reign of king Rāma III and printed with a Siāmese translation by H.R.H. Prince Damrong Rajanubhab (B. E. 2464, i.e. A. D. 1920). The Siāmese transcription of the text was made with the help of a Brahmin Mukupusvāmī (?) and Luāng P'hirivanakorn. verses quoted in Nītimañjarī are identical with the Cārucaryā (or are clearly based on this work) and two with the Hitopadeśa. The author wanted to utilize as many well-known moral teachings as he could for the purpose of illustrating them with Vedic examples, while reflecting upon the morals to be derived from the ṛca-s of the Ṛgveda.

37. Also another type of of a subhāṣita-saṁgraha is the Purāṇārtha-saṁgraha; it is a digest of knowledge of all branches of learning, as included in some Purāṇa-s, Dharmaśāstra-s, Darśana-s, etc. compiled by Veṅkaṭarāya[1] and preserved in several South Indian MSs. The work is written in purāṇic style as a conversation between Lakṣmī and Nārāyaṇa. The work is of a South Indian origin and of unknown date; it is divided into 30 chapters of which only the 11th dealing with nīti and rājanīti was edited; it contains 136 verses; each epigram is proclaimed in the first part of the verse and then illustrated with an episode from the Purāṇa, Itihāsa, etc. The verses are often paraphrases of the original subhāṣita-s.

38.1. A very well known subhāṣita-saṁgraha is Vallabhadeva's Subhāṣitāvalī[2]. We do not know much about the author and the question of its dating gave rise to long discussions[3]. It is generally accepted, however, that

The discussion is based on the fact that a verse from the Subhāṣitāvalī was quoted by Sarvānanda in the commentary on the Amarakośa which he wrote in 1106. See also D. S. Bhattacharya, Date of the Subhāṣitāvalī in JRAS (1927) p. 471 sqq. and (1928) ; p. 135 sqq. 403 and 900 and Subodh Ch. this anthology, in the form in which it is available to-day, could not have been compiled earlier than the 15th century[1]. This is an extensive anthology on a large variety of topics usually found in most Sanskrit anthologies. It contains 3527 verses, both of ethical and descriptive character. The anthology is divided into 101 paddhati-s. According to the analysis made by P. Peterson it quotes some 360 poets[2]. In addition to stray verses, Vallabhadeva quoted parts of different works, such as Maṅkha's Śrīkaṇṭhacarita, Śambhu's Rājendrakarṇapūra and others.

38.2. It was believed that with this subhāṣita-saṁgraha, the Subhāṣitāvalī of Śrīvara is associated. However, it was proved that this anthology is another text of the Subhāṣitāvalī of Vallabhadeva.[3] Śrīvara lived in the latter part of the 15th century; he was the disciple of Jonarāja who continued Kalhaṇa's Rājataraṅgiṇī. Śrīvara himself also wrote a Rājataraṅgiṇī in continuation of the one composed by his teacher Jonarāja.

39. From the end of the 15th and the first half of the 16th century dates the Padyāvalī of Rūpa Gosvāmin, son of Kumāra and the disciple of Caitanya, the founder of Bengal Vaiṣṇavism, teacher and exponent of its doctrines[4]. The Padyāvalī is rather a devotional work than a subhāṣita-saṁgraha as far as its contents are concerned; it quotes also other poetical devotional works, such as 32 stotra-s, among which is also the Ujjvala-nīlamaṇi: it contains 387 verses ascribed to 129 authors, as well as to Rūpa Gosvāmin himself. Most of the verses, due to their devotional character, were usually not quoted in other anthologies with the exception of Harikavi's Subhāṣitahārāvalī, an anthology from the middle of the 17th century which borrowed 36 verses from Rūpa Gosvāmin's work[5]. Rūpa Gosvāmin quoted also other earlier non-Viṣṇuite authors and unscrupulously changed sometimes the wording to make them sound Viṣṇuite.

1. Cf. M. Winternitz, HSL III. 1 (op. cit.): p. 179 sqq. If we accept that date, then the argument adduced by S. N. Dasgupta and S. K. De in HSL (p. 414) that Jalhaṇa's Sūktimuktāvalī based his anthology on the Subhāṣitāvalī of Vallabhadeva must be wrong.

Also mention is made of a Subhāṣitāvalī of Acārya Sakalakīrti, a Jain : the anthology is said to be written in saṁvat 1938 (A.D. 1880) at Śravaṇa Belogola (DC. xx, 12139).

40. Probably from the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th century dates the anonymous S u b h ā ṣ i t a-m u k t ā v a l ī[1] ; it must have been compiled before 1623, since one of the MSs. is dated saṁvat 1680 (A.D. 1623)[2]. The anthology is divided into 32 muktāmaṇi-s (ornaments of pearls) and contains 624 verses including the appendices. The verses are both ethical and descriptive. The anthology is quite important since it contains many sayings not quoted in other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s ; it was, however, possible to identify a great number of its verses[3].

41. Most of the other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s were compiled in the 17th to 19th centuries. Worth noting are in particulars two anthologies compiled by Harihara and/or Hārāvalī ; the first is the Sūktimuktāvalī and the second the Subhāṣitahārāvalī. They were not written by the same person.

41.1. The S ū k t i m u k t ā v a l ī of H a r i h a r a was written by a Mithilā Brāhmin in the first half of the 17th century. This anthology was published twice : in 1889 (second ed. in 1910) in the KM Series No. 86 and in 1949 by Ramanātha Jhā in the Newspapers and Publications Ltd,. Patna, respectively. The latter edition is a critical edition ; it is based on 5 MSs. and contains 634 verses. Unlike other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s its verses are not subhāṣita-s composed by different authors but they are mostly composed by Harihara himself ; only very few are known subhāṣita-s belonging to the floating mass of oral tradition. The work is divided into 12 prakaraṇa-s which deal with gods and goddesses, upbringing of a child, advice to the young, staying abroad, eulogy of the king and treatment of royalty, rājanīti, six seasons, erotics, and nāyaka-s, miscellanea and calm of mind. Being a one man subhāṣita-saṁgraha, this work stands nearer to individual collections of subhāṣita-s, such as Bhartṛhari's Śatakas, than the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s described above.

Edited on the basis of two MSs. from the Bhandarkar Or. Res. Institute's Collection No. 819 of 1886-92 and No. 75 of 1871-72. The edition contains an Introduction, the text, five appendices, of which the fourth is a copy of a short kāvya-work entitled Navaratna ; it must have been a very popular poem, since it was also well-known in Ceylon. (Cf. H. Bechert, Sanskrit-Texte aus Ceylon ; I. Teil in Münchner Studien für Sprachwissenschaft....München 1962 ; pp. 25-7 and was also inextenso included in the Subhāṣitahārāvalī. Cf. L. 41.2. The Subhāṣitahārāvalī of Śrī Harikavi[1] is an anthology of 2091 ethical and descriptive verses par excellence, though it contains also some excellent verses composed by Harikavi himself.[2] Harikavi, the compiler of this anthology was the son of Nārāyaṇa, originally a Deccani Brahman who lived first in Surat and then at the court of king Sambhāji ; he composed his work in the second half of the 17th century ; it is unlikely that he was contemporary to Akbar (1556-1605) or identical with Akbarīya Kālidāsa.[3] The work was unfortunately never published yet though it is one of the best and most interesting subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s. It contains numerous ascriptions to different poets of which some are well known. Harikavi knew the Padyāvalī of Rūpa Gosvāmin. This anthology is known only in one MS in the Bhandarkar Or. Research Institute (No. 92 of 1883-89) ; the MS is composed of several pieces, separately paginated;[4] some parts of the MS were written by different scribes and overlap each other. Particularly, the latter parts of the MS, as well as its second part contain many errors and poor readings, but its first part is very well-written and almost free of mistakes. The numbering of the verses is irregular and at many places verses are not numbered at all. A great number of subhāṣita-s occur also in other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s where they are usually ascribed to the same poets as in this anthology. This work requires a critical edition in the nearest future.

42. Also requiring a critical edition is the not yet edited Śṛṅgārālāpa-Subhāṣitamuktāvalī; it is the largest anthology on love devoted to śṛṅgāra alone. The anthology is divided into 11 chapters and contains 1145 mostly descriptive verses. It is known that MS No. 92 of 1883-84 in the Bhandarkar Or. Res. Institute contains this anthology ; the MS was written by Yājñika Rāma in saṁvat 1612 (A.D. 1556) ; it is probably an autograph copy and its compiler seems to be identical with Kulīna Rāma who also lived in the middle of the sixteenth century. The anthology is well-written and contains many verses not found in other anthologies. Its characteristic feature is the inclusion of extracts, sometimes long from well known works, such as the Meghadūta, the Kumārasaṁbhava, Rudraṭa's Śṛṅgāratilaka, or Bhartṛhari's

1. It was sometimes wrongly considerd as identical with the Sūktimuktāvalī.

2. And his brother Cakrapāṇi.

3. See P. K. Gode, Harikavi alias Bhānubhaṭṭa a Court-poet of king Sambhāji and his works in ABORI, 16.262-91. P. K. Gode identified Harikavi as the author of the Subhāṣitahārāvalī, the Śambhurājacarita and the Haihayendracarita ; he also proved that Harikavi was also called Bhānubhaṭṭa. Cf. also : P. Peterson, Second Report for 1883-84 in JBBRAS 17. 57-64 ; H. Sharma, The Subhāṣitahārāvalī in IHQ (1934) : p. 478 sqq. Kr. p. 367 and New Indian Antiquary 3 (1940) : pp. 81-100 ; L. Sternbach, On the Subhāṣitahārāvalī and on the Sūktisahasra in Journal of the Gaṅgānātha Jhā Kendriya Sanskrit Vidyapeeṭha 28.3-4 and book-review of the Padyāvalī (op. cit.).

4. Some parts of the MS are recopied twice, epigrams (Northern version). Otherwise the anthology does not contain ascriptions to poets (except occasionally and before quoting the subhāṣita-s). Several verses of this anthology were quoted in the edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams published by D.D. Kosambi and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa edition. In this anthology the author underlines that men lose all interest in life without Śṛṅgāra and that Śṛṅgāra is holy and brings pleasure and prosperity.[1]

43. Less interesting is also an unpublished MS No. 361 of 1884-86 in the Bhandarkar Or. Res. Institute containing an anthology of verses by Manirāma entitled Ślokasaṁgraha; it contains 1606 mostly descriptive verses, many of which are ascribed to different authors and works (110 in number) including Maṇirāma himself. The anthology has a lacuna between verses 190 and 204, and 1454 and 1496. In the Bhandarkar Or. Res. Institute there is also another MS containing the same text, viz., MS 527 of 1887-91, of which the first three folia are lost; ends at fol. 98a. Many of the subhāṣita-s quoted in this anthology are also quoted in the D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa edition. The anthology was compiled in the second half of the 17th century. Maṇirāma is probably identical with Maṇirāma Dīkṣita, the author of the Śṛṅgārasañjīvanī who was the protégé of Mahārāja Anūp Singhjī of Bikaner.[2] According to others he was the court poet of Rāja Ṭoḍar Mal.

44. The Budhabhūṣaṇa is ascribed to king Śambhu or Sambhājī son of Shivajī, the Great.[3] However king Sambhājī was not a man of letters and it is unlikely that he himself was its author; if so, he was certainly helped by some paṇḍits. The anthology contains 882 mostly ethical verses and is divided into three sections; the first (194 verses) contains subhāṣita-s quoted from several well-known authors; the second (630 verses) deals mostly with artha and contains quotations from the Kāmandakīya Nītisāra, the Matsyapurāṇa, the Viṣṇudharmottara, the Mahābharata, the Yājñavalkya-smṛti, the Mānava-dharmaśāstra, etc.; the third section (58 verses) deals with information useful to princes and therefore is called miśraka-nītiprakaraṇa.

45. Also from the 17th century date:

769 ethical and descriptive verses; many of the verses are ascribed to different poets, usually of later date, which occur also in several other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, but many of the subhāṣita-s were composed by the author himself (150, usually attributed to "Lakṣmaṇa"). The anthology was written between 1625 and 1650[1].

45.2. The Rasikajīvana of Gadādhara Bhaṭṭa, son of Gaurīpati Bhaṭṭa from Mithilā[2]: it was described as a work of rasa which also bears the character of an anthology[3] but is a subhāṣita-saṁgraha, par excellence. This anthology is divided into ten prabandha-s and contains 1478 ethical and descriptive verses; many of the verses are ascribed to different poets (139) and 535 verses are anonymous[4].

45.3. The Sabhyālaṁkaraṇa of Govindajit[5] composed somewhat on the lines of the Rasikajīvana. Its author, Gavinadaji (Sanskritized into Govindajit) of the Mevaḍa caste of Medapaṭa was the son of Caku from Giripura, (the anthology was published on the basis of a very poor MS, full of Critically edited for the first time...by Dr. Jatindra Bimal Chaudhuri in Prācyavāṇī Mandira Saṁskṛta-Granthamālā. Sanskrit Text Series II., Calcutta 1944. There exists also a complete edition of this anthology, but without indication as to its editor and place/date of publication. Also several verses (from the beginning of the anthology) were critically edited and translated by P. Regnaud (Stances sanskrites inédites par P. Regnaud in Annuaire de la Faculté des Lettres de Lyon, Paris 1884. Cf. P. K. Gode, Rasikajīvana of Gadādharabhaṭṭa and its probable Date in ABORI 12: pp. 396-9). The first mentioned edition quotes in extenso only 109 verses, viz., 2, 4, 5, 15, 33, 34, 36, 37, 44-9, 56, 72, 74, 75, 77, 78, 81, 111, 120, 125, 131, 164, 165, 205-6, 218, 233, 346, 350, 393, 428, 506, 552, 572, 615, 655, 703, 782, 784-5, 790, 796, 799, 800, 804-5, 812, 847, 852, 855, 856, 857, 858, 861, 864, 868, 871-2, 874-81, 886 (incomplete), 889, 897, 898 901, 903-5, 926, 930, 965, 970, 971, 974, 994, 1011, 1013, 1028-9, 1032-3, 1039, 1052, 1098, 1100, 1102-3, 1109, 1124, 1189, 1196, 1314, 1392-3, 1398-1400, 1465 and 1477 and 8 verses in MS B; they are unknown in other sources.

4. P. K. Gode: Rasikajīvana and its Probable Date in ABORI 12.396-9. P. K. Gode and H. D. Sharma expressed the opinion that the Rasikajīvana must have been composed after 1650 (probably around 1660), however V. V. Raghavacharya was of the opinion (Some further Light on the Date of Gadādharabhaṭṭa and the Rasikajīvana in Summaries of Papers of the XI All-India Oriental Conference, Hyderabad; p. 92) that the work is of a much later date, viz., from the second quarter of the 18th century, since the author mentions Ghanaśyāma, a minister of king Tukkājī Mahārāja of Tanjore who ruled from 1728 to 1735.

mistakes[1]; the text needed therefore many amendations and still is far from faultless; the anthology contains 853 ethical and descriptive verses; it is divided into numerous sections called marīcis (rays); it quotes 101 authors and works. Many of the verses are well known subhāṣita-s; the anthology was composed after 1656, since it quotes the Cimanīśataka written in 1656[2]).

45.4. The Padyaveṇi of Veṇīdatta, son of Jagajjīvana, grandson of Nīlakaṇṭha belonging to the Yājñika family[3], is divided into six taraṅga-s: (the work contains 889 mostly descriptive verses many of which are ascribed to different poets (114): several of these poets are probably contemporaneous to Veṇīdatta who himself wrote many of the subhāṣita-s quoted in the anthology (230). According to Th. Aufrecht this anthology was composed in 1644 and according to Rājendralāl Mitra in 1710[4].

45.5. The Padyāmṛta-taraṅgiṇī of Haribhāskara, son of Āpājinanda (or Ājājibhaṭṭa) of the Kāśyapa gotra and belonging to the family of Agnihotṛ[5] containing 301 mostly descriptive verses: (the majority of the verses are attributed to 45 different poets and 11 different works: it was compiled in 1673; Haribhāskara's son Jayarāma wrote a commentary to this anthology.[6]

45.6. The Sūktisundara of Sundaradeva containing only 174 mostly descriptive verses (many of the verses included in this anthology praise Muhammadan rulers, viz. Akbar, Shāh Jahān, etc.); Sundaradeva must have been familiar with the conditions existing at the courts of some of these rulers; a great number of subhāṣita-s quoted in this anthology appear also in the Padyaveṇi of Veṇīdatta and in the Padyāmṛta-taraṅgiṇī; it quotes 32 poets. It was written between 1644 and 1710.[7]

45.7. The Anyokimuktāvalī of Haṁsavijayagaṇi, is an anthology of Jainistic character written in 1679; it is divided into 8 pariccheda-s and contains 1199 verses, mostly anyokti-s often quoted in other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s.[1]

45.8. The Śrīsūktāvalī[2] which probably also belongs to this category, though its date is not known ; its author is also not known ; the work was edited on the basis of a single MS.[3] ; it is divided into fourteen paddhati-s plus a closing chapter ; the 12th paddhati is sub-divided into six parts and the 13th paddhati into two parts. The anthology contains 192 mostly ethical verses ; none of them is ascribed to any poet or work. The MS. on which the edition is based is full of mistakes ; the edition is poor and contains many errors.

46. Of the later subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s two are outstanding, viz. the Padyataraṅgiṇī of Vrajanātha and the Vidyākarasahasraka.

46.1 The Padyataraṅgiṇī of Vrajanātha, who lived at the court of king Mādhava, son of Jayasiṅg, in the middle of the 18th century (1753) exists in two versions, one longer in twelve taraṅga-s preserved in 4 MSs. and a shorter in ten taraṅga-s preserved in 2 MSs. ; all the MSs. of the longer version are incomplete ; the shorter version completely preserved in all the MSs. The shorter version was analysed by N. A. Gore and his analysis was published in the Poona Orientalist[4] ; it shows that the anthology contains 489 mostly descriptive verses and that most of these verses occur also in other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and that they are well known ; many of them are from the Hitopadeśa, Pañcatantra, Bhartṛhari's epigrams, Cāṇakya's collections of verses, etc.

46.2 The V i d y ā k a r a s a h a s r a k a of V i d y ā k a r a M i ś r a[1] was compiled in Mithilā in the middle of the 19th century; it contains 999 mostly descriptive verses, most of which are attributed to poets, known or unknown; the latter are usually from Mithilā; many readings of the subhāṣita-s quoted are corrupt. The language of many verses is poor and sometimes Sanskrit is mixed with Prākrit.

47. During the second half of the 19th and in the 20th century India was inundated by modern subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, many of which were edited as text-books of Sanskrit for the use in the schools, as well as in order to preserve "ancient thoughts" and "ancient moral teachings". The most complete and carefully edited is the S u b h ā ṣ i t a-r a t n a-b h ā ṇ ḍ ā g ā r a m by N ā r ā y a ṇ a R ā m a Ā c ā r y a "K ā v y a t ī r t h a"[2] which was published in several editions; the eighth and last edition was published in 1952. It was based on an earlier work of the same compiler called S u b h ā ṣ i t a-s u d h ā-r a t n a-b h ā ṇ ḍ ā g ā r a[3] which was published in the Veṅkaṭeśvara Steam Press, Bombay, saṁvat 1985 (1927). The Subhāṣita-ratna-bhāṇḍāgāram quotes the best subhāṣita-s from subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s published earlier, as well as from primary sources. The later editions of this anthology include also most of the verses quoted in the second edition of O. Böhtlingk's Indische Sprüche. Upto date it is the most complete modern subhāṣita-saṁgraha. Another modern subhāṣita-saṁgraha is the three volume work of O t t o B ö h t l i n g k, I n d i s c h e S p r ü c h e[4] which in its second edition[5] contains 7613 ethical and descriptive verses critically edited with notes and variants; it contains also a German translation of each verse. Several supplements to this collection were published.[6]

48.2. Anyoktimuktāvalī of Somanātha, a poet and musician, being a collection of subhāṣita-s in anyāpadeśa-style[2] containing 102 verses mostly in Mālinī metre.

48.3. Anyoktiśataka of Bhaṭṭa Vīreśvara[3] containing 105 anyokti-s in Śārdūlavikrīḍita and Sragdharā metres.

48.4. Anyoktyaṣṭakasaṁgraha,[4] a collection of 123 anyokti-s in 17 aṣṭaka-s (most of the verses occur also in other collections of anyokti-s and subhāṣita-s).

48.5. Anyoktistabaka of Vaṁśīdhara Miśra[5] containing 104 anyokti-s; the edition is based on a MS. dated saṁvat 1727 (1674).

48.6. Anyoktitaraṅgiṇī,[6] divided into two śataka-s and consequently containing 200 anyokti-s plus a closing verse.

48.7. Avaśiṣṭānyokti containing miscellaneous verses ascribed to Paṇḍitarāja Jagannātha[7]; it contains 588 verses mostly belonging to the floating mass of oral tradition or subhāṣita-s found also in other anthologies (only a small number of these verses were written by Paṇḍitarāja Jagannātha).

subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s (such as the Prasaṅgaratnāvalī, Sabhātaraṅga, Sphuṭaśloka and Sūktisaṁgraha) and other works ; O. Böhtlingk used this anthology in the Supplements to his Indische Sprüche.

48.40. Subhāṣtaratnākara of Nārāyaṇa Prasāda Miśra with a Hindī translation, edited by Ananta Śāstri Ghagve.[1]

48.41. Subhāṣitaratna-karaṇḍakathā of Āryaśūra,[2] edited from a single Nepāli MS., divided into 27 kathā-s containing 2 to 43 verses each, teaching the various pāramita-s (perfections) ; the work is ascribed to Āryaśūra, but its editor and the editor of the Jātakamāla [to which it is annexed], P. L. Vaidya are of the opinion that the author of this anthology is not the famous Āryaśūra[3] but an author who lived later ; this point of view is challenged by V. V. Mirashi.[4] This anthology belongs to the Buddhist collections of moral sayings.

48.42. Subhāṣitaratnamālā compiled by K. G. Cipalūṇakar,[5] a comprehensive subhāṣita-saṁgraha designed as text-book for students (several editions of the work appeared ; vol. I is divided into three parts of 100, 200 and 300 subhāṣita-s and Vol. II is divided into two parts of 400 and 750 subhāṣita-s, respectively).

48.43. Subhāṣitaratnamālā[6] or a Garland of the Gems of Sanskrit Poetry being an anthology consisting of about 3000 verses under numerous subjects alphabetically and metrically arranged by N. Sundaram Aiyar.

48.44. Subhāṣitaratnamālā compiled by Musaddirāma Śarman with a Hindī commentary.[7]

49.17. Padyataraṅgiṇī of Brajanātha (MS. in ASB; HC. VII. 5465, containing 300 stray verses dealing with different subjects; incomplete).

49.18. Prasaṅgaratnāvalī (in eleven MSs. in GMLM; DC. XX. 12068-78, being an anthology of stray verses compiled from Purāṇa-s, Śruti-s and Kāvya-s by Potayārya of Vādhūlagotra, son of Śiṅganārya by his wife Śiṅgāmbā ; the anthology was originally divided into 79 paddhati-s ; none of the MSs. is complete ; the first MS. is dated śaka 1388 (A.D. 1466) ; some of the MSs. are written in Telugu and Kanarese characters).

49.19. Prastāvaśloka (MS. in BORI 321 of 1884-86 ; G. XIII. 429 ; anonymous, containing stray verses).

49.20. Rasapārijāta of Bhānukara Miśra from Mithilā, a great incomplete anthology, probably from the 17th century ; the author of the Rasapārijāta, son of Gaṇapati Miśra, was patronized by the first Nizam.[1]

49.21. Sabhātaraṅga of Jagannātha Miśra (MSs. 416 of 1884-87 ; 594 of 1891-95 ; 852 of 1895-1902 ; and 107 of 1919-24 in BORI ; the first of the MSs., contains only few interpolations ; the other MSs. are somewhat different ; the anthology is divided into 47 or more sections ; most of the verses are attributed to different poets).[2]

49.22. Sabhyābharaṇa (MS. in ASB ; HC VII. 5452 ; with a commentary entitled Raśmimālā by Govinda, son of Nīlakaṇṭha, being a collection of 580 stray verses to be used in a learned assembly).

49.23. Sāra-muktāvalī, dated saṁvat 1650 (A.D. 1592), compiled by Śrī Municandragaṇi written by Pt. Śivahaṁsa (MS. 1492 of 1886-92 in BORI ; Jainistic ; probably prototype of most of the Jainistic anthologies ; several verses of this anthology were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa).

49.24. Śataślokī, an anonymous subhāṣita-saṁgraha. MS. in the India Office Library (Keith 7238). Many of the verses of this anthology are well known, and some of them were quoted by O. Böhtlingk in his Indische

49.25. Ś l o k a s a ṁ g r a h a, an anonymous subhāṣita-saṁgraha. MS. in the Library of the Calcutta Sanskrit College (No. 123 of the Descriptive Catalogue, Vol. VI) containing verses culled from several famous works, such as the Mahābhārata, etc.

49.26. Six different Ś l o k a s a ṁ g r a h a-s of B ā b ā K ā ś ī n a n d a, Ś r ī d h a r a, V i ṭ ṭ h a l e ś a and three a n o n y m o u s (all MSs. in ASB ; HC VII. 5461, 5457, 5458, 5460, 5469 and 5471, respectively ; the first is a modern compilation, the second and third are MSs. from the 19th century and the sixth is a MS. from the 18th century ; the fourth and the fifth are incomplete ; the second contains 400, the third 144 and the fifth 176 stray verses).

49.27. S u b h ā ṣ i t a of B r a h m ā (MS. in ASB ; HC VII. 5474, being a collection of stray verses which denounce, in poor sanskrit, intoxication in general and smoking of tobacco in particular as the characteristic feature of the iron age).

49.28. S u b h ā ṣ i t a, Jainistic (MS. 1423 of 1887-91 in BORI) ; no name or title, since the first 2 folia are lost ; other folia are numbered 3-37 ; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams).

49.29. S u b h ā ṣ i t a, no title because fol. 1 missing (MS. 91 of 1883-84 in BORI) fol. 2-42 in Śāradā script and fol. 23-42 in Devanāgarī script ; contains mostly wise sayings similar to Vallabhadeva's Subhāṣitāvali ; several verses were quoted in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa edition).

49.30. S u b h ā ṣ i t a, Jainistic, older than and different from other Jainistic anthologies (MS. 1425 of 1887-91 in BORI ; folia numbered 241-347 ; complete ; several verses were quoted in the edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams published by D. D. Kosambi and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa).

49.31. S u b h ā ṣ i t a, no title because first folia missing. Jainistic, (MS. 1396 or 1884-87 in BORI ; not complete, starts with fol. 21 ; some 800 verses were lost ; does not contain ascriptions ; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams).

49.32. S u b h ā ṣ i t a, an anthology, without title, being a fragment of a collection of subhāṣita-s, in Telugu script, divided into chapters such as sajjana, durjana, etc., a characteristic peculiar to South Indian subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s. The MS. is from the nineteenth century and is preserved in the India Office Library (Keith 7247).

49.33. S u b h ā ṣ i t a-s, three similar unnamed collections of subhāṣita-s, of which the first contains mostly verses culled from the Pañcatantra ; the second is an imperfect collection of stray verses belonging to the eighteenth century A.D., written on 24 folia ; and the third is a collection of stray verses also belonging to the eighteenth century, of which only one leaf is preserved. These three MSs. are kept in the India Office Library (Keith 7240, 7241 and 7242).

49.34. S u b h ā ṣ i t a-k h a ṇ ḍ a of G a ṇ e ś a b h a ṭ ṭ a (in the MS. the author is given as Gaṇebhaṭṭa ; Jainistic (MS. 105 in Rājāpur ; 22 folia, in reality 23, because fol. 17 is numbered erroneously twice, minus first 3 fol. which are missing) ; written in Jainanāgarī ; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams.

49.35. S u b h ā ṣ i t a r a t n a k o ś a of B h a ṭ ṭ a ś r ī k ṛ ṣ ṇ a[1] containing some 2000 verses, divided into 7 sections (MS. No. 93 of 1883-84 in BORI; contains only the first 155 fol. ; how many are missing is not known ; verses are not attributed to any poets or works ; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa).

49.36. S u b h ā ṣ i t ā r ṇ a v a, an exhaustive subhāṣita-saṁgraha (MS. in the Asiatisches Museum der Kais. Akademie der Wiss. 324 fol. in Beṅgālī characters ; many of the subhāṣita-s, not ascribed to any poets or works, were not quoted in other anthologies ; many of the verses were edited by O. Böhtlingk in his Indische Sprüche).

49.37. S u b h ā ṣ i t ā r ṇ a v a of G o p i n ā t h a (MS. 820 of 1886-92 in BORI ; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa).

49.38. S u b h ā ṣ i t a-s ā g a r a, Jainistic, divided into 72 adhikāra-s (MS. 424 of 1899-1915 in BORI ; first two folia missing ; the rest upto fol. 48 numbered ; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams).

49.39. S u b h ā ṣ i t a-s a ṁ c a y a or S u b h ā ṣ i t ā n ā ṁ P r a-b a n d h a, an anonymous collection of 366 stray verses written on 20 folia, of which many were also quoted in the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati. 106 of the 336 verses are well-known subhāṣita-s published by O. Böhtlingk in his Indische Sprüche. One MS. is kept in the Library of the British Museum (Burnell No. 253) and another one in the India Office Library (Keith 7246).

49.40. S u b h ā ṣ i t a- s a ṁ g r a h a (MS. No. 91 in Bhandarkar's Report 1883-84 : p. 56 ; fragment of an anthology of verses of which many are attributed to different authors).

49.41. Subhaṣita-sāra-druma, an extensive, anonymous anthology written on 46 folia (marked 82 to 127) in Nandi-nagarī script; the MS. is probably from the eighteenth century and is kept in the India Office Library (Keith 7244).

49.42. Subhaṣita-sāra-samuccaya (MS. in ASB; HC. VII. 5454) containing 844 verses and quoting 151 poets of which as many as 34 are not known from any other anthologies or other sources; probably from the end of the 17th century since it quotes verses of Veṇīdatta, influenced by his Padyaveṇī; it quotes mostly mediaeval poets; J. B. Chaudhuri used this MS. in his editions of several subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s.[1]

49.43. Subhāṣitasavaskṛta (?)-ślokapārambhaḥ (?), an anonymous anthology of 74 verses (MS. R. 41 in the Bibliothèque de l' Université de Lyon) which was partly edited by P. Regnaud in his Stances Sanskrites inédites d'après un manuscrit de la Bibliothèque Universitaire de Lyon in Annuaire de la Faculté des Lettres de Lyon; fasc. 2 (1884): pp. 1-22. This anthology is preserved in a beautifully written paper manuscript. It contains a great number of verses composed in different metres; many of these mostly descriptive verses are quite well known. P. Regnaud also edited from the same MS. another unnamed anthology containing 61 descriptive verses composed in different metres (idem, fasc. 2 of 1885) and 187 mostly descriptive verses from a MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale de Paris (idem, vol. VI); most of the latter verses are little-known anyokti-s. (It was not possible to trace the latter MS.).

49.44. Subhaṣita-śloka, an anonymous anthology in Mahārāṣṭrian calligraphy (MS. 324 of 1881-82 in BORI; 22 plus 38 folia); verses are rarely ascribed to their authors and if so done, the ascriptions are given before the verses; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and in the Subhaṣitaratnakoṣa.[2]

49.45. Subhāṣita-sudhānanda-laharī, a collection of 113 stray verses (incomplete).[3]

2. In the Government Oriental Manuscirpt Library, Madras, there are five more Subhāṣita-śloka-s, containing stray verses of ethical import and wise sayings (DC. xx. 12130-34).

3. DC. xx. 12136.

49.46. Subhāṣita-suradruma of Keḷadi Basavappa Nāyaka, a voluminous anthology (MSs. 228 of the later additions of BORI and 2271-2 at Śṛṅgeri as reported by Lewis Rice in his Catalogue [Bangalore 1884] and in the Library of the University of Bombay; the first and the third are paper MSs., the second is a palm-leaf MS.); the compiler intended probably to write this anthology in 5 sections; the paper MSs. contain section I, II and IV; section III appears only in the palm-leaf MS. and is full of erotic verses; folia are separately numbered for each section; several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams; D. D. Kosambi started editing this anthology from the Śṛṅgeri MS.[1]

49.47. Subhāṣitāvalī, an anonymous Jain anthology (MS. 1424 of 1887-91 in BORI; dated saṁvat 1673); several verses were quoted in D. D. Kosambi's edition of Bhartṛhari's epigrams and in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa.

49.48. Sūcanikāpatrāṇi (MS. in ASB; HC VII. 546P, dated saṁvat 1872), being an index to a big anthology embracing various subjects in 255 topics.

49.49. Sūktāvali of Lakṣmaṇa (MS. No. 230 in P. Peterson's Three Reports on a Search... : p. 35), an anthology comprising 1000 verses, many of which are ascribed to individual poets.

49.50. Sūkti-ratnāvalī of Vaidyanātha Tatsat, in two parts, of which the longer follows the pattern of the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati and from which the compiler probably borrowed much of his material (MS. 1203 in the India Office Library and 4032 in the Harvard University Library, dated saṁvat 1754 [1698]; the latter MS. ascribed to Vaidyanātha Pāyaguṇḍe of the Tatsat family, son of Rāmacandra or Rāmabhaṭṭa Sūri and grandson of Viṭṭhalabhaṭṭa who lived in the second half of the 17th century); the anthology does not quote any authors or works.[2]

49.51. Vidagdhajana-vallabha, different from Vallabhadeva's Subhāṣitāvalī, probably one of the earliest anthologies preserved in 3 MSs.; its compiler is Vallabhadeva, son of Malhaṇadeva, a Kaśmīrian; several verses of this anthology appear also in the Subhāṣitāvalī of Vallabhadeva; some of them are attributed to the same authors in both anthologies but sometimes they are attributed to different poets or are anonymous in one of the two anthologies.[1]

The work is almost identical with the Sūktiratnāvalī. Cf. P. K. Gode, Date of the Sūktiratnāvalī of Vaidyanātha Tatsat in BhV 2.2 : pp. 192-5.

49.52. Vivādabhūṣaṇa of Bālakṛṣṇa belonging to the Atri-gotra with an anonymous commentary (MS. in ASB ; HC VII. 5472) ; a collection of miscellaneous stray verses.

Other Subhāṣita-Saṁgraha-s

50.1. Some authors of histories of Sanskrit literature and in particular M. Krishnamachariar,[2] mention, without description, 62 other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s; a great number of them are still in MSs.[3] ; some of the latter are quoted in the various catalogues,[4] but many are not even registered.[5] Our knowledge of subhāṣita-literature is still very limited.

50.2. To the subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s mentioned above, anthologies from special branches of Sanskrit literature or on special subjects should be added. There are, for instance, anthologies from Vedic texts and śastra-s,[6] from Purāṇa-s,[7] from inscriptions,[8] or dealing with special branches of learning, for instance

50.3. In addition to these subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s we know of the existence of the following six anthologies mentioned in the known subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s: Prasaṅgaratnāvalī quoted in the Subhāṣitaratnākara[5]; the Sabhātaraṅga quoted in the same anthology; the Sphuṭaśloka quoted in the Subhāṣitaratnākara[5]; the Sūktiratnākara quoted in Jalhaṇa's Sūktimuktāvalī[6]; the Sūktisahasra also quoted in Jalhaṇa's Sūktimuktāvalī, the Śārṅgadhara-paddhati and the Subhāṣitahārāvalī[7]; and the Sūktisaṁgraha quoted in the Subhāṣitaratnākara.[8]

50.4. Also the newly published "An Anthology of Indian Literatures" edited by K. Santaram, Bhāratīya Vidyā Bhavan, Bombay 1969, could be added. Part I contains a selection from the Sanskrit literature and in particular its chapter VIII subhāṣita-s (pp. 108-14). However neither the text of the subhāṣita-s nor the sources are given there; the work contains only the English translation of the subhāṣita-s.[8]

Collections of Gnomic, Didactic and other stray verses: Cāṇakya, Bhartṛhari

51. The gnomic and didactic Sanskrit poetry is also closely connected with anthologies, for the latter are collections of stray gnomic verses composed by different poets and culled from different sources. The difference lies in the principle that anthologies are collections of verses composed by different authors, while the gnomic and didactic poems are collections of verses composed by one author only. However, that is not always so in Sanskrit literature. Collections of gnomic and didactic verses, presumably written by a single author and attributed to him, in general parlance, need not necessarily be composed by this author; they were usually in majorem gloriam only attributed to one author, while they were borrowed from the floating mass of oral tradition. That is particular the case of the two main works of gnomic and didactic literature—collections of verses attributed to Cāṇakya and Bhartṛhari. The latter accepted the old division of subject matter into the four puruṣārtha-s: dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa which were regrouped in the collections of epigrams attributed to him into three śataka-s: nīti (dealing with artha and dharma), śṛṅgāra (dealing with kāma) and vairāgya (dealing with mokṣa and dharma).

52. The Sanskrit subhāṣita-literature as well as the didactic and gnomic poetry are very extensive. Both do not contain only straight sententious sayings and didactic verses, but also allegories (anyokti-s) and satiric verses in which the authors either benevolently or harshly and sarcastically ridiculed men and their behaviour: the didactic literature is also closely connected with devotional and even erotic literature. Highly sensuous pictorial effects, authenticated by a deep sincerity of ecstatic emotion were often blended into one and thus helped to create poems full of erotic mysticism, devout yet sensuous. In India worldly wisdom, religious devotion and sensual love (kāma as well as śṛṅgāra) are often intermingled; the early division of aphorisms and epigrams on worldly wisdom into those dealing with dharma, nīti, kāma (śṛṅgāra) and mokṣa had made a great impression on Sanskrit literature and śṛṅgāra by its piquancy had added further flavour to the entire Sanskrit literature, including even the devotional literature. Therefore, to draw a demarcation line between these types of Indian literature is impossible. It might be therefore correct to mention among the subhāṣita-literature not only the didactic and gnomic poetry but also some lyric, erotic and devotional poems.

53. As stated above the best representatives of the gnomic and didactic poetry are the sayings attributed to Cāṇakya and the epigrams attributed to Bhartṛhari. Although a large group of verses attributed to Bhartṛhari were probably composed by the latter, it is not certain whether the same can be said about the sayings attributed to Cāṇakya. There are 2235 sayings attributed to the latter and 852 epigrams attributed to Bhartṛhari and it is impossible to believe that one person could have been the author of 2235 or 852 sayings, respectively. Although it is impossible to ascertain the authorship of these sayings to any of these authors, we must consider most of the sayings as being anonymous and authorless and belonging to the floating mass of oral Indian tradition, extremely valuable for appreciating and understanding the wisdom of the Hindūs and eo ipso for the present Mahāsubhāṣita-saṁgraha. The numerous sayings, epigrams and aphorisms ascribed to Cāṇakya and Bhartṛhari are now easily accessible since all the sayings attributed to these authors were collected and critically edited.[1]

54. Bhartṛhari's Śataka-traya has found many imitators; some of them have written more ornate stray gnomic verses in kāvya-style but never attained the hight of Bhartṛhari's poetry.

54.1. An imitation of Bhartṛhari's Vairāgya-śataka is Śilhaṇa's Śāntiśataka,[2] a collection of 104 stray verses[3] in a variety of metres and divided into four pariccheda-s.

54.2. Dhanadarāja's Śatakatrayam is, as Bhartṛhari's epigrams, divided into śṛṅgāra-, nīti- and vairāgya-śataka-s; it is composed of 103, 103 and 108 stray verses; Dhanadarāja, son of Dehala composed his work in A. D. 1434; his poetry is inferior to that of Bhartṛhari.[4]

54.3. Janārdanabhaṭṭa's Śṛṅgāra-śataka and Vairāgya-śataka composed of 101 stray verses each[5] of which many are erotic.

There are many editions of Bhartṛhari's Śataka-s and many works on Bhartṛhari. The best critical edition is "The Epigrams attributed to Bhartṛhari including the Three Centries ... by D. D. 3. Different MSs. contain, additionally, 18 verses.

4. Published in KM. XIII. 33-80.

5. Published in KM. XI. 157-72 and XIII. 131-44.

54.4. Narahari's Śṛṅgāraśataka (there are many Narahari-s and it is not known which Narahari was the author of this work); the Śṛṅgāraśataka is a collection of 115 stray verses.[1] 54.5. Appayya Dīkṣita's Vairāgya-śataka, a collection of 101 stray verses[2]; Appayya Dīkṣita was a prolific poet who lived in the second half of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century.

54.6. Paṇḍitarāja Jagannātha's Bhāminīvilāsa which has also something in common with Bhartṛhari's Śatakatraya[3]; it is divided into four parts (vilāsa-s) which deal with nīti (varying from 100 to 130 verses)[4], śṛṅgāra (101 to 184 verses), vairāgya with the glorification of Kṛṣṇa-Viṣṇu (31 to 46 verses); it also contains an elegy to the deceased sweet-heart (18-19 verses). The text is different in several MSs. and it is not known which verses were written by Paṇḍitarāja Jagannātha and which are interpolations; at least one-fourth of the verses is of doubtful origin. The author lived in the 17th century and was also the author of the Avaśiṣṭānyokti (op. cit.), some lyrical works, stotra-s and kāvya-s.

55. Possibly, influenced by Bhartṛhari is a Jainistic collection of 922 stray verses, viz. Amitagati's Subhāṣita-ratna-saṁdoha.[5] Amitagati lived probably in the 10th century; his work is divided into 32 chapters, of which each deals with a specific subject; each chapter is, as a rule, written in the same metre, but different one from the preceding chapter. The author expands in this work the entire ethics of Digambara Jainas, gives rules on ethics for monks and laymen and condemns all aspects of Brahmanism. It is an important work on Jaina ethics. The chapters deal with, among others, anger, arrogance, deceit, greed, carnal pleasure, defects of women, truth, wisdom, family, old age, death, instability, karman, villain, the good man, warnings of drinking, eating meat and honey, love and paid love, gambling, etc. Amitagati's style is generally ascetic, harsh and severe and his work is a subhāṣita-saṁgraha par excellecne with a distinct Jainistic tendency.

Collections of Jainistic and Buddhistic Gnomic and Didactic stray verses

56. The Jainistic gnomic and didactic literature is quite extensive.

56.1. Amitagati, in addition to the Subhāṣita-ratna-saṁdoha wrote also the Yogasāra, a didactic poem in śloka-s containing mostly moral Jainistic instructions (in 9 chapters); an ethical poem, the Dvātriṁśatikā; and a direct attack on Brahmanism—the Dharmaparīkṣā.

56.2. Hemacandra, basing himself possibly on Amitagati's Subhāṣitasaṁdoha, wrote in A. D. 1236 the Yogaśāstra (the first four chapters) which contains didactic teachings.[1]

56.3. Also Jinadatta Sūri (A. D. 1075-1154) wrote three didactic Jainistic poems, namely, the Upadeśarasāyana-Rāsa, the Kālasvarūpakulakam and the Caccarī.

56.4. At the end of the 13th century Somaprabha (or Somaprabhā-ācārya, or -Sūri), pupil of Vijayasiṁha wrote the Kumārapāla-pratibodha, a didactic poem and collection of tales in Prākrit, Sanskrit and Apabhraṁśa; it deals with the five Jainist commandments and other prescribed duties. Among others, he was also the author of the Sūktimuktāvalī or Sindūraprakāra, a collection of 99 popular wise sayings and moral duties appropriate for Jainas and praising Jainas; this work was very popular and many sayings were, and still are, known by heart by many men and women of the Jainistic community.[2]

56.5. Other Jainistic didactic poems were written later, e.g., the Śṛṅgāra-vairāgya-taraṅgiṇī by another Somaprabha, being a short collection of 46 erotic and ascetic stray verses, diatribes against women[3]; the Gāthākośa of the 12th century (in Prākrit) by Municandra

Sūri[1]; the Gāthāsahasrī by Samayasundara[2]; and the Bhavavairāgyaśataka, a collection of 100 stray verses on the vanity of existence.[3] Of didactic and satirical genre is the Dhūrtākhyāna of Haribhadra Sūri which contains humorous satiric stories of rogue and many others.

57. Also in the Buddhist literature we find many didactic collections of stray verses. The best known is certainly the Dhammapada; also important anthologies of stray verses of Buddhist character are Candragomin's Śiṣyalekha-dharma-kāvya[4]; Śāntideva's Bodhicaryāvatāra; Śikṣāsamuccaya; Sūtrasamuccaya; Subhāṣita-saṁgraha, an anthology of extracts from Buddhist works compiled by an unknown author to illustrate the doctrine of scholastic and of mystic (Tāntrik) buddhism[5]; Dharmasamuccaya of Avalokitasiṁha edited in Sanskrit, Tibetan and Chinese[6]; and others.[7]

Short collections of Gnomic Didactic and other stray verses

58. Other gnomic and didactic poems containing stray sententious sayings are numerous. Also from these poems[8] some of the sayings were culled and included in the present Mahāsubhāṣita-saṁgraha. They are quoted below in alphabetical order :

59.1. Āmūru Vedavyāsa's Nītiśataka, a short poem of 100 stray verses on nīti representing the author's observations on nature and Sternbach, On Some Non-Canonical Subhāṣita-Collections in Jaina Literature in the Commemoration Volume Mahāvīra and his Teachings, Bombay 1974.

8 In addition, verses were also culled from Mahākāvya-s, epics, dramas and other literary works.

the behaviour of good and bad persons ; the verses are written in anuṣṭubh-s ; the collection is divided into 5 headings. The poem dates from the first half of the 19th century. The MS. of which the first folia are missing, was published by S. Ritti.[1]

59.2. Bhallaṭa's Śataka (Bhallaṭaśataka), a poem containing 108 stray didactic and descriptive verses written in satirical tone, often ridiculing undiscriminating patrons ; composed in a variety of metres.[2] Not all verses were composed by Bhallaṭa himself, since we find among them some verses written probably by Ānandavardhana, a poet from Kaśmīr. Bhallaṭa himself was also a Kaśmīri poet who lived at the time of king Śaṅkaravarman (883-902). Many of Bhallaṭa's verses were quoted in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and works on alaṁkāra-s.[3]

59.3. Bhavabhūti's Guṇaratna, a short poem of 13 stray verses in a variety of metres attributed, probably wrongly, to the great poet Bhavabhūti[4] ; also popular in Ceylon ; most of the verses are culled from other poems, such as the Hitopadeśa, (verses 3, 8, 12), the Pañcatantra (verses 5, 9), the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings (verses 6, 11), the Skanda-purāṇa (verse 7) and the Mālatīmādhava (verse 1) ; one verse also occurs in the Dṛṣṭāntaśataka (verse 13). Very few verses in the Guṇaratna were not borrowed from known sources. Probably this collection of stray verses was ascribed to Bhavabhūti because its first verse is the first (in some editions the second) introductory verse of Bhavabhūti's Mālatīmādhava. Only verses 2, 4, and 10 of the Guṇaratna do not appear in other primary sources of which verse 5 was probably very popular in India in early times since it also appears in the literature of Tibet : in Vararuci's Śatagātha (4) (Mchog sred, Tshigs-su bcad-pa brgya-pa) included in the Tibetan Tanjur, and also in the She-rab Dong-bu (150) and the Subhāṣita ratna-nidhi (4, 14).

59.4. Bhoja's Cārucaryā, a collection of 135 stray verses, mostly in śloka-metre, dealing with daily routine, good and right conduct and activity in one's daily occupation.[5]

59.5. Dakṣiṇāmūrti's Lokoktimuktāvalī, a collection of 94 devotional verses and wise sayings, composed in a variety of metres and divided into six paddhati-s ; each verse is composed of two parts ; in the first part a truth is proclaimed and the second contains an argumentation or corroboration reinforcing the truth or an example illustrating it. Dakṣiṇāmūrti lived probably between A. D. 1450 and 1600.[1]

59.6. Ghaṭakarpara's Nītisāra, a collection of 21 stray verses written in a variety of metres ; the poem is written in the form of a dialogue between a hog and a lion and contains mostly wise sayings culled from other poems, particularly from the Hitopadeśa.[2] Ghaṭakarpara is also the author of a collection of 23 stray verses, called the Ghaṭakarpara-kāvya (also called Yamaka-kāvya) ; this poem deals mostly with the pangs of separation of a love-stricken lady who speaks to the clouds and asks them to transmit her massage to her husband ; it is a dūta-kāvya.[3] When Gaṭakarpara lived is not known. By tradition, he was considered as one of the nine jewels at the court of Vikramāditya, but it is not certain whether he was the author of both of them—the Nītisāra and the kāvya, nor whether he was one of the nine jewels at the court of Vikramāditya. The Ghaṭakarpara-kāvya was also sometimes ascribed to Kālidāsa.

59.7. Govardhanācārya's Āryāsaptaśatī, a collection of 202 erotic stray verses in āryā-metre arranged in vrajya-s by initial letter.[4]

59.8. G u m ā ṇ i P a r t's two poems—the G u m ā ṇ i--n ī t i and the U p a d e ś a ś a t a k a. Gumāṇi was born in 1790 and wrote in Sanskrit, Kumaunī and Hindī. The Gumāṇiśataka is a very popular work in the North of India[1]; it is a collection of 71 stray verses in which in one line a proverb in Hindī or Kumaunī is quoted and in three lines some situation aptly illustrating the concluding proverb is poetically described in Sanskrit; the illustrations are mostly based on the Mahābhārata, or the Rāmāyaṇa. Gumāṇi used unusual metres.[2]

59.9. T h e U p a d e ś a ś a t a k a[3] is a collection of 102 stray verses in ārya-metre, in which, similarly as in Gumāṇi-nīti, each epigram is proclaimed in one part of the verse and illustrated in the second part with an episode well-known from Sanskrit litterature, particularly from the Mahābhārata, the Harivaṁśa, the Rāmāyaṇa, the Bhāgavata-purāṇa, etc.

59.10. H a l ā y u d h a's D h a r m a v i v e k a, a short collection of 20 stray verses, mostly sententious and culled from other sources in a variety of metres. As it is evident from verses 6 Halāyuddha flourished at the court of Lakṣmaṇasena at the end of the 12th century (?).[4]

59.11. J a g a n n ā t h a P a ṇ ḍ i t a r ā j a's A ś v a d h ā ṭ ī,[5] a gnomic and devotional poem of 70 stray verses, all in mattebha-metre.[6]

59.12. J a l h a ṇ a's M u g d h o p a d e ś a, a collection of 66 verses in śārdūlavikrīḍita-metre,[7] containing warnings against snares of prostitutes.

Jalhaṇa probably knew the Kuṭṭanīmata and was influenced by this work; he was also a Kaśmīrian poet and lived in the 12th century; he is not identical with the author of Sūktimuktāvalī.

59.13. Kalya Lakṣmīnṛsiṁha's Kavikaumudī,[1] an anthology of anyokti-s in two śataka-s of 101 and 46 verses respectively composed in a variety of metres. The author, who was the pupil of Ahobala-sudhi, lived in the 18th century.

59.14. Kṛṣṇavallabha's Kāvyabhūṣaṇaśataka, a collection of 103 stray verses composed in a variety of metres; from the 18th century.[2] The verses are mostly descriptions of women.

59.15. Kusumadeva's Dṛṣṭāntaśataka (or Dṛṣṭāntakalikā), a fifteenth century collection of 100 wise sayings indicated in the first line and illustrated in the second line[3]; part of this work is also quoted in the Subhāṣitāvalī of Vallabhadeva.

59.16. Madhusūdana's Anyāpadeśaśataka, a collection of 110 stray verses (mostly anyokti-s) composed in a variety of metres.[4] Madhusūdana was the son of Padmanābha and Subhadrā, and was a native of Mithilā.

59.17. Mohamudgara, a short poem of 17 to 18 devotional gnomic stray verses in moric metre attributed, probably wrongly, to Śaṅkara. The verses describe the voidness of the universe and blessing of mental peace and of knowledge of Viṣṇu. This is a well-known and often published Indian poem[5]; it was often translated into English, as well as into French, German and Indian languages.

59.18. Mūrkhaśataka, an anonymous, collection of 25 stray verses plus an introductory verse, listing and describing hundred fools.[6]

59.19. Nīlakaṇṭha Dīkṣita's Anyāpadeśaśataka, Kalividambana, Sabhārañjanaśataka, Śāntivilāsa and Vairāgyaśataka, five[1] poems containing stray gnomic, didactic and satiric verses and wise sayings of 101, 102, 105, 51 and 101 verses, respectively; the first is in śārdūlavikrīḍita-metre, the second and third in anuṣṭubh-s, the fourth in mandākrāntā-metre and the last in upagīti-āryā-metre.[2] Nīlakaṇṭha Dīkṣita was the son of Nārāyaṇa Dīkṣita and grandson of Āccān Dīkṣita II, brother of the well-known Appayya Dīkṣita; he lived in the 17th century. The Anyāpadeśaśataka is a collection of anyokti-s teaching good conduct; the Kalividambana is a satire on various social characters in the family and outside, as well as on quacks, doctors, poetasters, astrologers who please the sick, but with a diet which would be difficult to follow, so that if the patient recovers it would be thanks to the greatness of the astrologer and if the patient's health deteriorates it would be due to the non-observance of the diet; the Sabhārañjanaśataka is a typical collection of wise sayings and the Śāntivilāsa and the Vairāgyaśataka are devotional poems advocating renunciation.

59.20. Pañcaratna, Ṣaḍratna, Saptaratna, Aṣṭaratna and Navaratna, short collections of 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 didactic stray verses in a variety of metres, all anonymous; the Navaratna was the most popular of these collections and was also incorporated in the Sanskrit literature of Ceylon, as well as quoted in extenso in the Subhāṣitamuktāvalī and in the Subhāṣitahārāvalī.[3]

59.22. R ā k ṣ a s a's K a v i r ā k ṣ a s ī y a,[3] a collection of stray didactic verses which can be interpreted in two different ways; particularly popular in Southern India. The author, otherwise unknown, was quoted by Appayya Dīkṣita in the 16th century. Also a poet Rākṣasa, but probably a different one, was quoted in the Saduktikarṇāmarta (450) and Śārṅgadhara-paddhati (3810-11).[4]

59.23. R ā m a c a n d r a's R a s i k a r a ñ j a n a, a lyric and gnomic poem of 130 stray verses written in different metres with a commentary without which the poem would be incomprehensible; the poem permits a two-fold interpretation in which each vese has an ascetic as well as erotic meaning; Rāmacandra,

Different from the K a v i-r ā k ṣ a s ī y a or R ā k ṣ a s a k ā v y a attributed to three different authors, sometimes to Kālidāsa, sometimes to Vararuci and sometimes to Ravideva; that poem is a pastoral description in 20 stray verses; it was published often, viz. in HSS 73, Sarasvatī Vilāsa Press, Narsiṅghapur 1908, Indian Press, Allahabad 1910 (1966), Vavilla Press, Madras 1926, Sarasvatī-nilaya Press, Vengipur 1875, Parabrahma Press, s. l. 1881, in NSP. 1900 and 1935, KSG 3.343-53; translated into Italian in GSAI 19.83-102 by F. 59.24. Śambhu's Anyoktimuktālatā, a collection of 108 anyokti-s, having double meaning, written in śardūlavikrīḍita- and *mandākrānta-*metres, ridiculing the folies of men. Śambhu lived at the court of king Harṣadeva of Kaśmīr (end of the 11th century) and wrote also the Rājendra-karṇapūra, a poem of 75 stray verses, mostly in śārdūlavikrīḍita-metre, in which he eulogized king Harṣadeva; many verses of the latter poem were included in the Subhāṣitāvali of Vallabhadeva.[2]

59.25. Śaṅkara's Śataślokī, a gnomic poem of 101 stray veses, written in sragdharā-metre, dealing with the teaching of Vedānta; whether this poem was really written by Śaṅkara is not certain.[3]

59.26. Śrī-kuru-Nārāyaṇa Kavi's Sudarśanaśataka, a gnomic poem of 101 stray verses in sragdharā-metre.[4]

59.27. Śṛṅgārajñānanirṇaya, of unknown authorship, a short poem of 32 stray verses being a dialogue between Śuka and Rambhā, partly erotic (words of Rambhā) and partly theosophical (words of Śuka).[5]

59.28. Vānarāṣṭaka and Vānaryaṣṭaka, two anonymous didactic poems of 8 verses each, written in a variety of metres, containing several subhāṣita-s known also from other sources.[6] neglected the learned men of his court.[1] Vāñchānātha is probably Kṛṣṇa Kavi whose father held a high post at the court of king Sahāji, ruler of Tanjore from 1684 to 1710 ; the poem contains a commentary Śleṣārthacandrikā written by the author's grandson.

59.30. Vararuci's Nītiratna, a collection of 15 wise sayings known also from other sources.[2] Vararuci was probably not the author of this short collection of stray verses which was attributed to him only in majorem gloriam. The verses were culled from the collection of the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings (verses 3, 4, 9, 10, 12, 14), the Hitopadeśa (verses 4, 14) and from the floating mass of oral tradition.

59.31. Vedānta Deśika's (or Vedāntācārya's or Veṅkaṭanātha Deśika's) Subhāṣitanīvī and Vairāgyapañcaka ; the first is a popular anthology of 144 stray verses composed in a variety of metres systematically divided into 12 paddhati-s of 12 verses each, dealing with pride, wickedness, servitude, nobility, tranquility, etc., the second consists of five verses in the form of a benevolent satire highlighting the practice of detachment ; some of the verses have a double meaning[3] ; the author, who was a Vedānta scholar lived probably between 1268 and 1370.

59.32. Vetālabhaṭṭa's Nītipradīpa, a short collection of very beautiful 16 wise sayings composed in a variety of metres, known also from other sources.[4] Many of the verses were culled from the Pañcatantra, the Hitopadeśa and other kathā-works, so-called collections of Cāṇakya's sayings, Bhartṛhari's śataka-s, etc. It is unlikely that Vetālabhaṭṭa was the author of this collection.

59.33. Vīreśvara's Anyoktiśataka, a collection of 105 stray anyokti-s in śārdūlavikrīḍita- and occasionally sragdharā-metres.[1]

60. These are only few of the best known didactic and gnomic poems; there are many more[2] containing stray verses mostly sententious sayings particularly still in MSs., of which the most important are[3]: the Abhilāṣaśataka of Kevalarāma comprising 264 verses (HC. vii. 5513); Bhāṣāmañjarī, a collection of stray verses, (AL. 582-3); Citraratnākara of Cakrakavi, a collection of humorous yet wise sayings (AL. 512-4); the poet appears to be the son of Lokanātha and brother of Rāmacandra and Patañjali; Dhik-pañcaka of Lakṣmī Nārāyaṇa (HC. viii. 5519); Dūrghaṭaśloka of Kuvalaya, a collection of 81 highly artificial stray verses praising several deities (AL. 526-7); Jaḍavṛtta of Mādhava, a collection of stray verses describing the characteristics and sentiments of stupid people, especially their mad and vulgar love (incomplete) (DC. XX. 11970); Kamalāsarasvatīvāda by Tripāṭhī Viśvambhara (HC. vii. 5516) containing in some MSs. 50 and in others 120 stray verses; Kaliguṇāṣṭaka of Raghunātha (HC. vii. 5522) comprising 15 verses, of which 8 describe the iron age and the remaining are salutations to Kālī; Kavirākṣasīya, an anonymous collection of 100 verses in anuṣṭubh-metre (DC. XX. 12000-12005); Kāvyasaṁgraha, a collection of stray verses culled from various sources enumerating groups of nine, eight, seven, six and five noted persons, things or qualities possessing the same or similar characteristics (DC. xx. 12007-8); Kucaśataka, an anonymous collection of 100 stray verses containing a description of the physical charms of women (DC. xx. 11936); Kuśopadeśa (Nītisāra), an anonymous collection of verses, divided into 3 aṣṭaka-s and containing lessons on worldly wisdom (HC. vii. 5496 with commentary); Lakṣmīcaritra, an anonymous collection of 50 stray verses (HC. vii. 5517); Lakṣmīsarasvatīvivāda, an anonymous collection of 110 stray verses in which Lakṣmī and Sarasvatī speak alternatively, each praising herself and denouncing her rival; in the quarrel the former succeeds in silencing the latter (HC. vii. 5515); Madanamukhacapeṭikā, an anonymous collection of 100 verses of which a part is a dialogue between a young lady and a recluse, she trying to allure his mind and he rejecting her advances sternly, dated saṁvat 1938 (A. D. 1880) (HC. vii. 5520); Manaḥ-śikṣārthamekādaśapadya by Raghunātha Dāsa with a commentary, a collection of 11 verses for the discipline of the mind, dated śaka 1750 (A. D. 1828) (HC. vii. 5504); Manogarhaṇa of Kṛṣṇakavi, a short didactic poem of no great value (AL. 557); Mṛgāṅgaśataka by Kavikaṅkaṇa, a collection of 100 stray verses praising the moon who inspires sentiments of love (DC. 11981); Nītidīpikā, an anonymous collection of wise counsels, incomplete (HC. vii. 5510); Nītisāra of Gaṅgādhara Dīkṣita, written in incorrect Sanskrit under orders of Akbar Sāhi (HC. vii. 5505); Nītiśataka of Kṛṣṇa Mohanakavi of Pūrvasthala in Bengal, a collection of 108 stray verses in 4 sarga-s, of which 32 deal with childhood, 29 with youth, 28 with mature age and 19 with old age (HC. vii. 5508); Padyapatrikā, a collection of stray benedictory verses (AL. 550); Paranārī-rati-niṣedha-pañcaka, an anonymous collection of didactic verses in which the intercourse with another man's wife is prohibited (HC. vii. 5521); Prākṛtapañca-ratna (Śṛṅgāramañjarī), an anonymous collection containing 10 stray erotic verses, culled from various sources (AL. 558); Pūrvapañcāśikā, an anonymous collection of 51 stray verses on different topics (BORI 56 of 1871-72; G. XIII, 419); Rakṣasaśataka, an anonymous, incomplete collection of 100 stray verses on piety and morality (HC. vii. 5492), it contains only 88 verses; Rasikajanarañjana by Vrajaburāja, son of Kāmarāja-dīkṣita, a collection of stray verses on attractions and charms of women in three śataka-s (DC. 11982); Siddhāntasudhātaṭinī of Rāma-candrāgamī, an incomplete collection of stray verses divided into topics in the form of a dialogue between husband and wife (HC. vii. 5511-2); Sindūraprakara by Somaprabha, disciple of Vijayasiṁhācārya (Jainistic), a collection of 100 stray verses on various topics (DC. xx. 12122); Sṛṅgārakāvya of Viśveśvara, son of Rāmaji, a collection of 97 stray verses on śṛṅgāra (HC. vii. 5271); Śṛṅgāraśataka of Mahādeva, son of Mukunda, a collection of 164 stray verses on śṛṅgāra (HC. vii. 5203); Śṛṅgāravīci by Nīlakaṇṭha, a collection of 700 stray verses on śṛṅgāra (incomplete) (HC. vii. 5243); Stanapañcaka, an anonymous collection of five stray verses dealing with certain bodily charms of women (incomplete) (DC. xx. 11991); Sūktivāridhi by Peddibhaṭṭa who belonged to the family of Mahopādhyāya of the Eleśavara city, an incomplete collection of ethical stray verses (HC. xx. 12143); Svarṇa-muktāvivāda by Maheśa Paṇḍita, a collection of 150 stray verses ending with a reference to Bahādur Shah, the author's patron, dated śaka 1740 (A. D. 1818) (HC. vii. 5507); Tāmbūlakalpa of Nṛsiṁhabhaṭṭa, a collection of stray verses showing the importance of chewing betel by quotations from Smṛti-s and Purāṇa-s and containing also at the end common topics on ācāra etc. (HC. vii. 5506); Tantrākhyānaśloka, an anonymous collection of lessons of worldly wisdom, being probably an abridgement of a fragment of a versified version of the Pañcatantra (HC. vii. 5502); Turagaśataka of Kuṭṭikavi and of Glaṇapatiśāstri, two collections of two śataka-s each containing stray verses on the glorification of horses (AL. 518-9); Vibudhabhūṣaṇa of Hālāsya-nātha, a collection of stray didactic verses of little beauty (AL. 1195); Vidagdhamukhamaṇḍana by Dharmadāsa, a collection of witty and cleverly composed stray verses on unconnected subjects divided into four pariccheda-s (DC. xx. 12116-17); Vidyāmañjarī of Dhīreśvara, a collection of 100 stray verses on the merits of learning divided into two chapters, dated śaka 1736 (A. D. 1814) (HC. vii. 5518); Vidyāsundara of Caurakavi a collection of 55 verses in a form of a dialogue between two lovers—Vidya and Sundara (HC. vii. 5114); Vibudhopadeśa, an anonymous collection of verses enumerating all things which a Sanskrit scholar should know (HC. vii. 5512); Viśveśvarāryāśataka by Viśveśvara, son of Lakṣmīdhara, a collection of 100 stray āryā-verses describing the beauties and other attractive qualities of women (with the commentary Viśveśvarāryāsaptaśatīvyākhyā) (DC. xx. 11984-5).[1]

1. Among the didactic poems M. Krishnamachariar in his History of Classical Sanskrit Literature mentions also the following works: Āryāmañjari of Devarāja; Āryāvijñapti by Rāmacandra, by Sītārāma and by Viśvanātha; Kavikaṇṭhābharaṇa; Nītikalpalatā by Sāhibrāma; Nītimañjarī by Śambhurāja; Nītimālā by Sadānanda (published in Calcutta); Nītisāra (also mentioned in DC. xx. 12062-7—6 MSs.); Nītiśāstrasamuccaya (also in DC. xx. 12055-61; 7 MSs., of which No. 12055 is attributed to Cāṇakya); Nītiśataka by Śrīnivāsācārya (also in DC. xx. 12053), by Sundarācārya, by Veṅkatarāya and one anonymous; Nītisumāvalī of Appāvājapeyin; Śāntivilāsa by Haridāsa and by Subrahmaṇya; Vairāgyaśataka by Padmānanda, by Śankarācārya and by Somanātha; Nītivilāsa by Vrajarājaśukla; and the Pañcatantrasaṁgraha.

Among the collections of anyokti-s (anyāpadeśa-s) M. Krishnamachariar mentions also: Anyāpadeśaśataka by Ekanātha Kāśyapi, by Gaṇapatiśāstri, by Gīrvāṇendra (also in DC. xx. 11994), by Ghanaśyāma, by Jagannātha and one anonymous; Anyoktikāvya, Anyoktikaṇṭhābharaṇa by Candracūḍa; Anyoktimālā by Āccān Dīkṣita (also in DC. xx. 11995), by Lakṣmīnṛsiṁha (also in DC. xx. 11996, but edited and published by Dr. K. Krishnamoorthy, op. cit.); Anyoktisaṅgrahādhyāya by Harikṛṣṇa; Anyoktiśataka by Bhaṭṭavīra; Darśanavijayagaṇi and by Somanātha; and Bhāvavilāsa by Nyāyavācaspati Rudraka. (p. 318 sqq.).

It is also known that MSs. of the Anyāpadeśapañcāśat of Gaṇapatiśāstri (AL. 423) and of Anyāpadeśapaddhati, anonymous (AL. 425) exist.

the Bhikṣāṭanakāvya of Utprekṣāvallabha (Śivadāsa)[1] could be added to this list but the first is a collection of verses attributed to Mayūra, culled from poems of Mayūra[2] and subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s ; the second is a lyric poem ; the third is a devotional and philosophical treaty ; and the fourth is an erotic and devotional poem.

62. Also another type of poetry can be added to the didactic literature, i.e. collections of riddles. Indian riddles belong also to the muktaka literature since they were composed in "detached" verses, so that each verse formed an entity by itself. They were very popular in India, the more so as Indian poets made always strenuous efforts to express nothing in a straight-forward manner and always desired to conceal as much as possible or to express an idea in a round about way (Dhvanyāloka 4.5). Consequently riddles were considered as one of the 64 arts (kalā-s).

We find riddles, theological riddles (brahmodya-s), already in the Veda-s, Brāhmaṇa-s, Āraṇyaka-s, Śrautasūtra-s, etc. They formed there an essential part of religious ceremonies (e.g., Ṛgveda 1.164 ; 1.95.4 ; 8.29 ; Atharvaveda 9.9 ; Vājasaneyi-saṃhitā 23.9, 10 ; 47-8 ; 61-2 ; Taittirīya-saṃhitā 2. 5. 8. 3 ; 7. 4. 18 ; Śatapatha brāhmaṇa 4.6.9.20 ; 6.2.5 ; 11.4.1.2 ; 5.3.1 ; 6.25 ; 13.2.6.9 sqq. ; 5.2.12 sqq. ; 14.6.8.1 ; Aitareya-brāhmaṇa 5.25 ; Kauṣītaki-brāhmaṇa 27.4 ; Taittirīya-brāhmaṇa 2.5.83 ; Bṛhad-āraṇyaka-upaniṣad 3.8.1 ; Āpastampa-śrautasūtra 20.19 ; Āśvalāyana-śrautasūtra 10.9.1-3 ; 8.13.13-4 ; Kātyāyana-śrautasūtra 10.9.1-3 ; 20.7.11 ; 124.20 ; Lāṭyāyana-śrautasūtra 9.10.9 ; Śāṅkhāyana-śrautasūtra 16.4-6.13 ; 37.1 sqq. ; Vaitāna-sūtra 37.1, 38.5 sqq.). We find also riddles in the epics (e.g., Mahābhārata 1.77-83 ; 33.12-3), in the kathā-litearture (e.g., Kathāsaritsāgara 5.1.65 ; 155 A ; 72. 163 D), in the Buddhist literature (e.g., Samyutta 10.12 ; Ālavaka-sūtta 1.10 ; Sūciloma-sūtta 2.5 ; Devatā-samyutta 1.6.4, Jātaka-s 17, 84, 135, 245, 257, 301, 319, 401, 414, 453, 473, 477. 483, 515, 516, 518, 521, 522, 530, 533, 539, 544, 545, 546 ; Puggalapaññatti IV ; II. 1.4.25 sqq. ; Culavagga 4.14.14-6 ; Milindapañha 7, etc.), in the Jaina literature (e.g., Bhāvadeva Sūri's Pārśvanātha-caritra 3.105, Hemavijaya's Kathāratnākara 8.192.6, 9.203.8-10, etc.) and others. Riddles were defined in the alaṁkāra-s and particularly in Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarśa (3.98-123) and divided there into 16 categories. However these categories were soon forgotten. Indian riddles took the form of general puzzles, enigmas, charades, conundrums, logogriphs, anagrams, epigrams, and even mathematical, grammatical, phonetical puzzles, etc. The most common riddles were ordinary, every day puzzles (prahelikā-s), charades with or without solutions in the text (antar-ālapa-s and bahir-ālāpa-s, respectively) and obscure, "crooked" riddles hard to solve without an explanation (kūṭani-s). They were often written in artificial ornate language and often used śleṣa-s, numerous types of yamaka-s, and several riddles were written so as to be read also in the inverse direction, in zigzag manner, in circles, in the form of a lotus flower, etc. Numerous riddles were included in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s where they were divided upto twelve categories and twenty-three sub-categories, different from those found in the Kāvyādarśa.[1] Several collections of riddles were composed probably not later than the fourteenth century A.D.

62.1. One of the most famous collections of riddles is the V i d a g d h a-m u k h a m a ṇ ḍ a n a of D h a r m a d ā s a.[2] Dharmadāsa is a popular name and when Dharmadāsa, the author of the Vidagdhamukhamaṇḍana, lived is not known ; he was certainly earlier than Śārṅgadhara, the author of ŚP. and Jalhaṇa, the author of JS., since some of Dharmadāsa's riddles are found there. He must be earlier than the second half of the thirteenth century, since one of his commentators, Jinaprabhasūri, was known to be active between 1293 and 1309. This collection of riddles, mostly prahelikā-s and ālāpa-s, often written in ornate and artificial language, is divided into 4 chapters and contains 220 verses written in Sanskrit and sometimes in Prākrit. Several commentaries were written on the Vidagdhamukhamaṇḍana. The riddles are difficult to solve ; they are like intelligence tests for Paṇḍits well versed in grammar and poetics.

62.2. Another popular collection of riddles is the B h ā v a ś a t a k a of N ā g a r ā j a (or N ā g a n ā t h a) ; this is a collection of 101 or 102 riddles mainly kūṭani-s written in a variety of metres, mostly in Sanskrit, but sometimes also in Prākrit. The verses are sometimes erotic in character and contain riddles where a question is asked what a person would do in a certain situation ; the reason is explained either by the author or by the commentator at the end of the verse. The poem is published as if having been written by Nāgarāja, son of Jālaya (or Jalapa), son of Vidyādhara of the Karpatti-gotra, one of the kings of the Ṭaka-dynasty; however, probably the work was only written under his patronage and the real author of the poem was Bhāva.[1] Similar to the Bhāvaśataka in the form and intent are riddles included in the Prākrit Vajjālaggam[2] of Jayavallabha. They are included in the chapter 64. They are also kūṭani riddles with a strong erotic touch. Some of the riddles were taken verbatim from Hāla's Sattasaī (Nos. 611 and 816=Sattasaī 816 and 916, respectively).

62.3. Collections of riddles were popular in India; among others are the Samasyādīpa, anonymous, in 175 verses of which 76 contain problematic lines of words to which a poet would be asked to give a sense and to put in a verse in his own way[3]; Sītāvinodakāvya, anonymous, in 120 verses describing how Sītā felt during the separation with Rāma in an enigmatic style[4]; Kāśīnātha's Dṛṣṭakūṭārṇava,[5] Himakara Śarma's Saṁsāra-vihārakāvya,[6] Prahelikāpahnuti-kūṭākhyāna,[7] Lakṣmī Nārāyaṇa's Samasyāpūrtti,[8] etc. Many of the riddles are explained either by the author himself or by the commentator. There are also unpublished subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s exclusively composed of well-known riddles,[9] as for instance the anonymous Kāvyakuṭhāra,[10] the Prahelikā-

Satiric Poems with Didactic stray verses

63. To this type of literature belong also the satiric and didactic poems, particularly of Kṣemendra,[4] one of the most prolific poets of India. He lived in Kaśmīr in the eleventh century (probably from 1010 to 1070). His works, not all of which are preserved to our days, may be divided into 5 groups : (1) didactic works ; (2) satirical and didactic works ; (3) poetical works ; (4) treaties on poetics and metrics ; and (5) miscellanea.

64. Pure didactic works full of wise sayings are the Cārucaryā-śataka and the Caturvarga-saṁgraha ; partly also the Kavikaṇṭhābharaṇa. The satirical and didactic works are the Kalāvilāsa, the Darpadalana, the Deśopadeśa, the Narmamālā, the Sevyasevakopadeśa and the Samayamātṛkā.

64.1. The C ā r u c a r y ā (The hundred verses of beautiful Life) is a collection of 100 stray verses in anuṣṭubh-metre[5] ; it deals often in a conventional manner with dharma and artha. Generally, the first line of the verse is a moral wise saying and the second an illustration of the truth proclaimed before, mostly drawn from the Purāṇa-s or epics. This work must have been very popular in India, since very often verses of the Cārucaryā are included in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, such as the Subhāṣitahārāvali, which quotes one-fifth of the work,[1] and in the Nītisaṁgraha, and since the Nītimañjarī of Dyā Dviveda of the 15th century was used as model for that work. At least it was greatly influenced by the Cārucaryā.[2]

64.2. The Caturvarga-saṁgraha[3] is one of the poorest works of Kṣemendra ; it contains 111 stray verses divided into 4 chapters (pariccheda-s) of 27, 25, 25 and 29 verses, respectively, they deals with dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa ; the work is supposed to be a practical handbook of morals written in a variety of metres ; it is however prosaic and dull. The kāma-pariccheda, stylistically and thematically more original, contains mostly descriptive verses.

64.3. The Kavikaṇṭhābharaṇa (A necklace for poets)[4] is a poem of only 55 verses divided into 5 chapters (sandhi-s) of 24, 23, 3, 2 and 3 verses, respectively. It is a short treatise on the making of the poet. Particularly the second sandhi is didactic, for it lays down one hundred pieces of advice for poets.

64.4. Kṣemendra, did not construe his satiric and didactic works in the form of collections of stray verses ; he usually divided them into chapters of which each dealt with a specific subject ; then he illustrated the subjects by witty stories. In these poems Kṣemendra has shown an excellent knowledge of the society and experience of life ; he depicted the society with sarcasm ; his remarks, sometimes expressed tediously, were concerned with topics rarely described by other poets. Perhaps the best of his satiric and didactic works is the

K a l ā v i l ā s a[1]. It is a poem divided into 10 cantos (sarga-s) of 96, 89, 76, 40, 46, 33, 26, 29, 73 and 43 ārya-verses, respectively, in which the legendary, Mūladeva[2] discusses with his young disciple, Candragupta various forms of cheating, greed, pitiable condition of those in love, viles of women, deceitful character of harlots, the unscrupulousness of kāyastha-s, pride and arrogance of drunkards, bards, dancers, actors, singers, goldsmiths and finally terminates his satire with good advice to young men how to avoid falling into evil ways. Kṣemendra illustrates his remarks by amusing tales. In particular in this work, Kṣemendra has shown his mastery in the use of Sanskrit language and his satire is lively and effective.

64.5. Also one of Kṣemendra's good satiric and didactic works is the D a r p a d a l a n a (Smashing of Pride)[3]; it is divided into seven chapters (vicāra-s) of 82, 113, 154, 75, 45, 54 and 73 verses, respectively, written in a variety of metres. It is more a didactic than a satiric poem. Each chapter begins with a series of wise sayings illustrated by means of witty stories in which pride is the main subject, for the Darpadalana is a diatribe against pride, due to high birth, wealth, knowledge, beauty, heroism, charity, or asceticism.

64.6. The D e ś o p a d e ś a,[4] one of the earliest works of Kṣemendra, is a poem divided into eight cantos (upadeśa-s) of 24, 36, 48, 34, 28, 45, 31 and 52 verses, respectively, composed in a variety of metres.[5] The poem is a satirical work, sometimes vulgar; it is full of wise sayings; it ridicules the cheat, the miser, the prostitute, the bawd, the viṭa, the Gauḍa-student in the Kaśmīri University for his behaviour and arrogance, old man's marriage with a young girl, kāyastha-s, poets, fickle wives, merchants, alchemists, false ascetics, quacks, grammarians, etc.

64.7. The Narmamālā[1] is akin to the Deśopadeśa and somewhat complementary thereof ; the satire is less biting and severe, and the poem seldom contains wise sayings ; it is rather a narrative satire than a didactic satire. The Narmamālā is divided into three parihāsa-s (jokes) of 148, 145 and 114 verses, respectively, largely in śloka-metre. In this work Kṣemendra ridiculed the administration and in particular the kāyastha-s whom he mocks in their public and private life, including their wives, the tax-collectors, the physicians, the astrologers, etc.

64.8. Also to this group of poems of Kṣemendra belongs the Sevyasevakopadeśa[2] (Instruction for the Servant and the Served) ; it is a short poem of 61 verses written in a variety of metres containing shrewd reflection on the relation of master and servant with the didactic motive to improve their mutual relations.

65.1. Kṣemendra wrote also, among others, an erotic, satiric and didactic poem, the Samayamātṛkā. He was undoubtedly inspired by Dāmodaragupta's Kuṭṭanīmata[3] (also called Śambhalīmata) (Advice of a Procuress), a poem of 927 to 1058 āryā-verses (not divided into chapters). Dāmodaragupta was, as Kalhaṇa reported, a well-known Kaśmīrian poet and minister of Jayāpīḍa of Kaśmīr (A.D. 779-813).

65.2. In the Kuṭṭanīmata, Mālatī—a prostitute from Vārāṇasī, addressed herself to a procuress, Vikarālā for instruction how to attract lovers. The procuress gave her shrewd lessons how to ensnare a lover (in particular Cintāmaṇi, son of a high official) and to win man's love and fortune. Many of her advices are didactic stray verses illustrated by amusing, cunning love tales. The work ends with the explanation of the reason why the poem was written : in order to help people from being cheated by wicked women, rogues and procuresses. The work was thus intended to be a didactic work based on the close study of the science contained in the Kāmasūtra.[1] Erotic tendency prevails in this work, but there is no didactic moralizing, nor any squeamish language in describing women and their ways ; it is a farcical sketch in which moral depravity is openly and amusingly depicted by the author, not with approval, but with the object of making it look ludicrous[2] and to quote profound thoughts in the form of subhāṣita-s of epigrammatic tendency often with plenty of humour and kindly wit. Dāmodaragupta painted vividly and benignantly rogues and gullible fools and rather than creating a biting satire, created a benevolent comedy in which he depicted delicate problems and exposed human weaknesses and faults with not too toothless irony. He showed good taste and restraint, so that his work can be considered as an elegant piece of poetry of considerable interest and unique in its style and sort,[3] as such, it was considered in classical and mediaeval India ; the frequent quotations from Dāmodaragupta's work in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and works on alaṁkāra-s prove this.

66. On the other hand Kṣemendra's Samayamātṛkā, an imitation of Dāmodaragupta's Kuṭṭanīmata, does not have the same merits. Kṣemendra did not show in his work any poetical talent or elegance. His work is often vulgar ; it is not an amusing comedy, but an acrid, cheap satire, often in bad taste. The Samayamātṛkā is a poem in 8 chapters (samaya-s) of 52, 108, 37, 134, 90, 36, 56 and 129 verses, respectively, composed mostly in śloka- and āryā-metres.[1] It depicts the snares of prostitutes, as told by an old procuress who taught a young prostitute Kalāvatī how to achieve mastery in her new profession ; it is illustrated by didactic stray sayings and amusing stories. The bawd's witty instructions aid Kalāvatī to cheat a young fool and his stupid parents. Kṣemendra, as was so usual to him, had proved to be an expert in Kamasūtra-s and a keen observer of life in Kaśmīr which he described with true realism and biting sarcasm.

67. The latter two texts are on the borderline between the didactic and gnomic literature and the erotic lierature ; poems belonging to the latter branches of Sanskrit literature can very often be also included among collections of stray verses (subhāṣita-s), as for instance the A m a r u ś a t a k a.

68. Although the works mentioned in paras 51 to 66 are not subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, as defined above (para 9), they contain a great number of subhāṣita-s and sententious sayings and as such were quoted in the present Mahāsubhāṣita-saṁgraha.

Subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s in 'Greater India'

69. The Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s influenced the literatures of 'Greater India'[3] and thus became known also in the North, South and East of India. Some of the collections of wise sayings were translated into the languages spoken

A. Tibet

70. In the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries A.D. some of the best known works in India, not necessarily of Buddhist character, were translated into Tibetan and were included in the Tanjur. In this way some Sanskrit gnomic poems which became lost in India were preserved in Tibet.

71.1. The Tibetans had a special liking for the gnomic (nīti) literature and in particular for collections of moral and ethical sayings. Thus, one of the best known Indian collections of gnomic verses, the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings, and in particular the Cāṇakya-rāja-nīti-śāstra version, was preserved in Tibetan through a translation made in the tenth or eleventh century A.D.

71.2. Since the first studies were made in the Tibetan Tanjur by A. Csoma de Körös in the first half of the nineteenth century, we know that eight works, containing collections of subhāṣita-s, were included in the Tanjur. These works are as follows[1] :

1. Śes-rab brgya-pa shes-bya-baḥi rab-tu-byed-pa ; in Sanskrit P r a-j ñ ā ś a t a k a-n ā m a-p r a k a r a ṇ a (according to P. Cordier[2] Śataka-prakaraṇa nāma) by A. Klu-sgrub (N ā g ā r j u n a) and translated by Sarvajña-deva, Dpal brtsegs. (No. 4328 [ṅo. 99 b⁴-103 a⁷]=No. 4501) ;

71.3. Particularly the last two works, i.e. the Cāṇakya-nīti-śāstra and the Nītiśāstra of Masurakṣa are subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s par excellance, of which the last became lost in India. Also the Gāthākoṣanāma of Ravigupta and the Śatagāthā of Vararuci contain a great number of subhāṣita-s.

71.4. The Tibetan C ā ṇ a k y a-n ī t i-ś ā s t r a was edited in Tibetan and retranslated into Sanskrit by Sunitikumar Pathak,[1] it is the Cāṇakya-rāja-nīti-śāstra version of Cāṇakya's sayings and is almost identical with the Bṛhatsaṁhitā of the Garuḍa-purāṇa [2]

The text is divided into 8 adhyāya-s which contain respectively 23, 30, 31, 17, 26, 23, 31 and 72 wise sayings. This text must have been well known in Tibet and probably was used by other Tibetan compilers of subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, since we find many of the same wise sayings also in the She-rab-dong-bu and the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi.

71.5. The text of the N ī t i ś ā s t r a of M a s u r a k ṣ a was completely unknown in India until 1962. Only then was it for the first time edited in Tibetan with a retranslation into Sanskrit and a translation into English by Sunitikumar Pathak.[1]

71.6. Masurakṣa is an unknown author ; he is mentioned only once in Vallabhadeva's Subhāṣitāvalī as the author of verse 2935 which is however a verse from the Pañcatantra[2] ; Masurakṣa (or Masūrākṣa) mentioned in the Tanjur is probably another person and was probably the compiler of a subhāṣita-saṁgraha which must have been popular in India in the tenth or eleventh century A.D.[3]

72. In addition to the gnomic (nīti) works preserved in the Tanjur we find also two other Tibetan subhāṣta-saṁgraha-s, undoubtedly at least in its greater part, of Sanskrit origin, viz., the She-rab dong-bu and the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi.

73.1. The S h e-r a b d o n g-b u (or P r a j ñ ā ś a t a k a) is a subhāṣita-saṁgraha in Tibetan which contains 260 wise-sayings ; in the colophon

We also find the name of a king Masurakṣita of Pāla family in the Tāranātha's History of Buddhism in India (in German translation by A. Schiefner, chapter 31 ; 171 : p. 225 and chapter 38 , 195 : p. 257) in the latter case along with Cāṇakya also of the Pāla family ; he was also mentioned as a king in ch. 27 (154-5 : p. 201) and ch. 33 (178 : p. 234). Masurakṣita, as an interim ruler of the Pāla dynasty of Bengal in the ninth century A.D., is also mentioned in the Dpag bsam bj oṅ bzab of Ye Śes dpal byor. In some stories Canaka (Cāṇakya) was identified with Mohipāla (see : Mystic Tales of Lāmā Tārānātha, transl. by Bh. Datta, Calcutta, p. 62). Monier Williams in his Sanskrit Dictionary, also quotes Masurakṣita as a name of king. See also : L. Sternbach's Review of the Nītiśāstra of Masūrākṣa in JAOS 82.3 : pp. 407-411.

it is ascribed to Klu-sgrub or Lu-trub, i.e., to N ā g ā r j u n a. M. Winternitz[1] considered that it was not likely that this anthology was the work of Nāgārjuna, while Campbell tried to prove that it was compiled or written by Nāgārjuna himself; if we accept Campbell's theory than the She-rab dong-bu was composed in the first century B.C. W.L. Campbell was of the opinion that this anthology was a metrical translation from Sanskrit of an ethical work. It seems, however, that She-rab dong-bu was compiled in the form known to us sometimes in the eleventh century A.D. when most Sanskrit works were translated into Tibetan and included in the Tanjur.

73.1.1. The She-rab dong-bu is a well-known work in Tibet, though it was more likely better known by the educated classes by name only. It was largely quoted by Tibetan authors. W. L. Campbell considered that later writers borrowed many sentiments and sometimes entire lines, inserting them in their own compositions. He particularly thought that Paṇḍit Sàkya had done so when preparing his Subhāṣita ratna-nidhi. It is difficult to subscribe to this statement since it was possible to identify only three subhāṣita-s which occur in both works[2] and two of them are Cāṇakya's wise sayings; their common source was probably the Cāṇakya-nīti-śāstra prevalent in Tibet.

73.1.2. The She-rab dong-bu was first edited by Rai Bahadur Sarat Chandra Das[3] and then by W. L. Campbell[4] who gave on the right-hand side the Tibetan text and on the left-hand side the English translation.

73.1.3. The work deals mostly with ethics and general wisdom; it contains only few Buddhistic truths (e.g. 61, 100) and even in these places some Sanskrit words could have been changed by the translator in order to fit the text with his own faith; such a procedure was also extensively applied in the Tibetan Cāṇakya-nīti-śāstra. She-rab dong-bu followed the patten of Sanskrit anthologies, as far as their contents were concerned and included, similarly as the main Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s did, wise sayings from the kathā- works[5] and from the floating mass of oral tradition.

73.2. The Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi is also a subhāṣita-saṁgraha in Tibetan; it contains 457 wise sayings and is divided into 7 chapters dealing with the wise, the prominent people, the excellent and the fools, wrong behaviour, normal behaviour, improper behaviour, duties of men and religious doctrines. The wise sayings included in this anthology are not always translations from Sanskrit but, perhaps with the exception of the last chapter, were influenced by Sanskrit sayings. Also the arrangement and the division of this anthology into the seven chapters mentioned above show Indian influences.[1] This anthology contains however one noticeable characteristic: it deals to a negligible extent with women, a subject dealt extensively in Sanskrit subhāśita-saṁgraha-s. It contains only isolated sayings with Buddhist leanings.

73.2.1. The Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi is ascribed to Paṇḍit Sākya (Saskya) Kun dgah rgyal-mis'han dpal-bzang-po; in Sankrit Ānanda Dhvaja Śrī Bhadra who was born in 1181 A.D. and died at the age of seventy in 1251 A.D. It was partly published in 1855-56 with an English traslation by Csoma de Körös[2]; there it contained only 234 out of 457 subhāṣita-s. Another extract of this work was translated into French in 1858 by Ph. E. Foucaux; it contains a selection of 134 subhāṣita-s. 12 of these subhāṣita-s were translated into German in 1860 and published in the Illustrirten Revalschen Almanach. A Schiefner published critically (with notes) 33 of subhāṣita-s and included them in the first edition only of Böhtlingk's Indische Sprüche in 1863-1865. Also G. Huth in his History of Tibet Hor chos byung, published and translated 19 subhāṣita-s. The whole text with a German translation was published in 1925 by W. L. Campbell (who also published and translated the She-rab dong-bu) in the Ost-Asiatische Zeitung, N. F. 2 (pp. 31-65 and 159-185). The best critical edition (of the Tibetan and Mongolian texts) with an English translation was published by J. E. Bossom as a thesis submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the United States and was produced by microfilm-xerography in 1967 by University Microfilms. A Xerox Company, Ann Arbor.[3] J. F. Bossom based his edition in the first place on the Tibetan and Mongolian text published by L. Ligeti in 1949,[4] as well as on some xylograph

73.2 2. There are many stories about the life of Paṇḍit Saskya[2]. We know that he made a long trip to China and resided in Middle Tibet (U Ts'ang) in the Saskya monastery in the province of Ts'ang "one hundred days distant" from Tashi Lhun-po. According to the introduction and the colophon, the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi was first compiled by Nāgārjuna but was written and edited by the Paṇḍita Saskya. Sometimes, in the beginning of the thirteenth century A.D., according to the legend, the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi was brought by Paṇḍit Saskya from China (sic !) but was lost by him when a boat overturned on a river. However, when Paṇḍit Saskya returned to his monastery he found it in the library[3].

73.2.3. Tibetan scholars consider that the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi, known there as Sa-skya legs-bcad (in Lhassan : Sakya Legshe), was not a work of one person but a compilation made by three scholars. They base this theory on the introduction where it is stated that the author of the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi took the best from various works of his predessessors. This argument is not convincing, since Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s had often such an introduction and for instance all the texts of the Cāṇakya-nīti-śāstra version begin with a similar introductory stanza.

B. Mongolia, Manchuria, Central Asia

74. Buddhist monks spread some Sanskrit works, particularly through Tibet, to Mongolia and Manchuria.

75.1. And so, the Tibetan Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi was translated into Mongolian and West Mongolian (Kalmuk) and became one of the most popular works in this part of the world, where great interest for gnomic and didactic literature was noticed.[1]

75.1.1. The first translation of the Mongolian Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi was attributed to Ch'os kyi od zer. Another translation from the fourteenth century by Toyin Sonom gara[2] exists in transcripts. Another translation called Sayin üge tü erdeni-yin sang subhasida kelegdekü sastir orusiba[3] (a treasure of gems of good counsel) was translated by dge slöng dambaidzamsan (dge sloṅ bstan pa'i rgyal mc'an) of the Urat on repeated advice of Sürüm that such a translation was essential. This translation was then elaborated by Mergen blama-yin gegen.[4] A further translation of the Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi and its comprehensive commentary by Noyirub (dṅos grub) from the Chaghan funinggba sumun of Tsakhar was prepared at the end of the eighteenth century after the Mergen blama-yin gegan had been compiled. Vl'adimircov also mentions a mongolian translation which originated among the Kalmuks and which dated from the seventeenth century. The MS. was prepared on the basis of a translation made in the fourteenth century by an unknown author : it has preserved some archaisms in the ortography and vocabulary, N. Poppe (op. cit. fn. 1) also reported that the Asiatic Museum of the Soviet Academy has a tibeto-mongolian MS. of the Subhāṣita-ratnanidhi ; it is a copy from the sixteenth and seventeenth cantury. Another translation of the Subhāṣita-ratnanidhi, the Sayin üge-tü ... by Sonom gar-a was also reported by L. Ligeti. He found among the Xarchin a MS. of the seventeenth and eighteenth century which preserved the archaism of a translation of the fourteenth century (see above).

printed in Chaghan agula süme in the district of Tsakhar. The printing blocs were prepared and are preserved in Chaghan aghule-yin süme of the Chaqar köbege tü Chaghan-i qosighan, the white mountain monastery of the white-bordered flag of Tsakhar.[1] This text is also combined with a commentary entitled Subhaṣidi-yin tayilburi chindamani-yin tülkigür kemegdekü ; the latter is the revised version of the Tibetan commentary of Rin chen bzaṅ-po. This version was published in book form in Kalgan sometimes between 1930 and 1950 and in Ulaanbastar in Cyrillic script, as well as in Mukden in Mongolian script. There exist also a West Mongolian (Kaḷmuk) translation of the work.[2]

75.1.2. Based on the Mongolian Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi or directly on the Tibetan Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi is the eastern Mongolian, Buryat work by Lama Irdini Maybzun Gallishev who lived among the Buryats in the second half of the nineteenth and in the beginning of the twentieth century. He prepared his "Mirror of Wisdom", published in Russian translation in 1966 in Ulan-Ude.[3] According to the introduction to this work, Lāmā Irdini prepared his work composed of 979 subhāṣita-s on the basis of subhāṣita-s of Gunga-al-an in Tibetan, i.e., the Sa-skya kun dgah rgya-mis'han dpal-bzang-po (Subhāṣita-ratna-nidhi). Many Sanskrit subhāṣita-s can be traced in this work, including some from the Pañcatantra, Hitopadeśa and the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings.

76. In addition to these works, being translations from Tibetan, we find in Mongolia and Manchuria collections of wise sayings which are either translations from Sanskrit or were influenced by Sanskrit subhāṣita-s. For instance some of the Mongolian and Manchurian sayings collected by Louis Rocher[4] definitely show that they are of Sanskrit origin, e.g., the Manchurian saying (13) which states that the king who likes the same things as his subjects like, who hates the same thing as his subjects hate, is like a father, mother to his subjects is certainly influenced by a subhāṣita found in the Sūktiratnahāra (2.156) which is a quotation from the Kauṭilīya-arthaśāstra (1.19.34) or from the Mahābhārata (12.56) or Śukranītisāra (4.4.204).

77. Some subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s found also their way to Central Asia. We find, for instance, among the finds of the German Turfan Expedition to Eastern Turkestan some fragments of the Laghu-Cāṇakya version of the so-called Cāṇakya's wise sayings.[1]

C. Dravidian Languages ; Ceylon

78.1. Sanskrit subhāṣita-s of didactic and gnomic character influenced the Tamil nīti-literature, in particular some of the 18 main didactic works, i.e., the Nālaṭiyār with its famous quadrains, the Tiru-k-kuṟaḷ (both divided according to the three puruṣārtha-s), the Nāṉmaṇi-k-kaṭikai, the Iṉṉā-nāṟpatu, the Iṉiyavai nāṟpatu, the Tirikaṭukam, the Ācāra-k-kevai, the Corupañcamūlam, the Ēlāti, the Mutumoḻi-k-kaña and to the lesser extent the Paḻamoḻi, the Kārnāṟpatu, the Kaḷavaḻi nāṟpatu, the Kainnilai, the Tiṇaimoḻi aimpatu, the Tiṇaimālai nūtraimpatu, the Aintinai aimpatu and the Aintinai eḻupatu, as well as such works as the Nīti-veṇpā, Nīti-neri-vilakkam, Naṉneri, Nalvaḻi and Aranericcāram which contain Sanskrit subhāṣita-s. It is very likely that the Tamil nīti-literature as well as the South Indian Sanskrit literature influenced the nīti-literature of Ceylon.[2]

78.2. The Siṁhalese subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, such as the Subhāṣitaya by Alagiyavanna, the Lōkōpakāraya by Raṇasgallē Thera of 238 verses, the Anurāgamālaya of 65 verses (despite its title has no erotic content), the Upāratnamālaya of 60 verses, as well as, in particular the text-book of poetry prepared by Attaragama-Baṇḍāra entitled Vadankavipota[3] contain some verses from, or influenced by Sanskrit subhāṣita-s.

79. In particular three Ceylonese subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s show a great affinity with Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s : the Vyāsakāraya, the Pratyayaśataka, both known in Sanskrit and the Siṁhalese Subhāṣitaya of Aligayvanna.

79.1. The Vyāsakāraya is a sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha which until recently was unknown in India. Only recently the Vyāsa-subhāṣita-saṁgraha[4] was published on the basis of two South Indian manuscripts and some ancilliary sources, of which one was the Ceylonese Vyāsakāraya[1] which is almost identical with the Sanskrit Vyāsasubhāṣita-saṁgraha ; the latter was certainly the basis for the Ceylonese Vyāsakāraya.

79.2. There is not such a clear-cut in the case of the Ceylonese Pratyayaśataka, a subhāṣita-saṁgraha in Sanskrit, well known in Ceylon[2] containing 102 wise sayings in śārdūlavikrīḍita-, vasantatilaka-, upajati- and śloka- metres. In the Pratyayaśataka the Sanskrit subhāṣita-s are seldom reproduced in their primary original form ; if they are reproduced at all, they are reproduced in the vulgate text and in the most popular form ; the majority of these subhaṣita-s were borrowed from the classical sources of Sanskrit literature. In addition some subhāṣita-s are paraphrases of known subhāṣita-s ; this paraphrase is usually correct as far the contents of the wise saying is concerned but not as far as its form ; often some subhāṣita-s are composed of two to four different components taken from more than one Sanskrit subhāṣita ; there are also many subhāṣita-s only influenced by thoughts which we also find in Sanskrit subhāṣita-s. All the subhāṣita-s which are paraphrases, or combinations of several subhāṣita-s, or verses influenced by some subhāṣita-s, or, finally, verses containing thoughts similar to those known to exist among Sanskrit subhāṣita-s, may have existed in the form preserved in the Pratyayaśataka, but at present are still unknown.[3]

79.3. As far as form is concerned, the Subhāṣitaya of Aligayavanna, a Siṁhalese subhāṣita-saṁgraha of 100 verses, is similar to the Pratyayaśataka. Also most of the subhāṣita-s included in the Subhāṣitaya are well-known Sanskrit subhāṣita-s ; some of these subhāṣita-s are also paraphrases of well-known wise sayings or were influenced by the Sanskrit subhāṣita-s. Only the 17 verses of the first part of this anthology, which is Buddhistic in character were probably not borrowed from the Indian literature.

79.4. In addition to these subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, the whole collection of Cāṇakya's wise sayings is prevalent in Ceylon ; that is the Cāṇakya-nīti-śastra version.[4]

D. Burma

80.1. Probably there must have existed in India, in the thirteenth, fourteenth or fifteenth century a collection of wise sayings which was particularly well known among the Manipurian Puṇṇa-s ; this collection which was, as J. Gray reported,[1] written in Bengālī characters, but also known in Sanskritised Burmese, penetrated into Burma and became well known as the Lokanīti, one of the four best known in Burma collections of wise sayings ; the three others are the Dhammanīti, the Rājanīti and the Lokaśara.

80.2. It is impossible to ascertain when these collections of wise sayings were compiled. J. Gray found the earliest reference in Burmese literature to the Lokanīti and Rājanīti in the Arākān rāzawin or the "Chronicles of Arākān" in connexion with Prince Kha Maung's visit to Pegu early in the seventeenth century, but did not find any reference to the Dhammanīti.

80.3. G. E. Gerini in his "Siāmese Proverbs and Idiomatic Expressions"[2] has shown that imitations of the Lokanīti occurred in a Burmese inscription at Pagan dating from 1408 or 1416 A.D. He thought that the Lokanīti was composed between 425 and 1400 A D. He saw the date a quo in the commentary on the Dhammapada—the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā—ascribed to Buddhaghoṣa, in which he could notice "strict analogies" between certain passages of the Lokanīti and the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā. On the other hand C. Temple[3] thought that the Lokanīti was not "of any great antiquity".

80.4. J. Gray considered that it was unlikely that the Lokanīti and the two other nīti-works were compiled between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. He seems to be right when saying that the wars between the Môñ-s and Burmese led to intercommunication between the two races. J. Gray also stated that Hindū colonists, besides, had settled on the lower valleys of the Irrawadi and Sittang rivers, and a religious struggle between Brāhmaṇas and Buddhists resulted in evolving the erudition of the learned Puṇṇa-s. Their services were soon utilized by the Burmese kings in furtherance of the cause of literature, and it was through their invaluable assistance that the study of Sanskrit became a sine qua non in the royal monasteries. Being familiar with the Māgadhī language and the local vernaculars they were of great help to the Buddhist rahan-s in the interpretation of the Piṭagat. J. Gray was further of the opinion that it was reasonable to suppose that when the great task was completed attention was paid to secular literarture, the outcome of which was the compilation of the Lokanīti, Dhammanīti and Rājanīti.

80.5. It is most probable that these nīti-works were prepared for a king's ācarya in order to enable him to discourse on ethics and polity, to pronounce moral sayings and give advice.[1] J. Gray thought that since these treatises were in use in the royal courts of India they could have been introduced in the Court of Ava.

80.6. C. Temple who, independently of J. Gray's research, studied the Lokanīti, could not find out much about the history of this book, although he personally made enquiries from the Burmese Sayā-s. He reported that according to one account it was written originally at an unknown date in Sanskrit (or Pāli) by the Pôngnā (Brāhmaṇa) Sānnékqyaw and paraphrased into Burmese in 1826 by the Hpôngyi U Pôk of the Mahā Oung Myē Bông Sàn Ok Kyoung at Ava. This U Pôk's name as priest was Sēk-kàn-da-bī, to which the king of Ava added the titles of Thīri Thaddamma-daza, Mahā Dama-yāza Guru. According to another informant of C. Temple, the author was a priest without very extraordinary knowledge of Pāli who either collected the wise sayings from old books or collected some of them and added others of his own composition.

80.7. During my stay in Burma in 1961, I also made unsuccessful enquiries into the origin of the three nīti-collections. I contacted the International Institute for Advanced Buddhistic Studies, Kaba Aye, Rangoon and several Burmese Sayā-s in Rangoon, Mandalay, Pegu and Pagan but no one could give me any information about these three nīti-works; although many of them knew about the existence of the Lokanīti, more by name than by its contents; they only knew that it was a book of proverbs on common life.

80.8. It does not seem yet possible to know when these nīti-works were compiled. The date suggested by Gerini seems to be too early, since the analogies with Buddhaghoṣa's Dhamma-padaṭṭhakathā[2] are more likely to be accidental and the moral sayings included in the Lokanīti are of a general and common nature. Temple's date of 1826 is certainly too late; it probably refers to one of the translations of the Pāli Lokanīti into Burmese, while the Pāli text was known in Burma much earlier. Therefore, it is quite possible that the

2. It is not certain whether Buddhaghoṣa really composed this commentary.

Lokanīti was composed in the beginning of the fifteenth century[1] and that the three other nīti-collections were compiled not much later.

81.1. The Pāli L o k a n ī t i is known today in Burma more by its name than by its contents. Two different independent translations into English were made in 1886 from Pāli by J. Gray[2] and from Burmese in 1875 (published in 1878) by R. C. Temple.[3] Gray's translation contains 167 wise sayings while Temple's translation 164 wise sayings. This difference is due to the fact that C. Temple combined sometimes two wise sayings into one.[4] The Lokanīti is divided into seven distinct sections dealing with: (1) wise men (1-40); (2) good men (41-67); (3) the evil-doer (68-78); (4) friendship (79-93); (5) women (94-111); (6) kings (112-137); and (7) miscellanea (138-167); such a division of subject-matters is very common to Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s.

81.2. The origin of a great part of Lokanīti wise sayings can be traced to classical Sanskrit sources and, in particular, to the Mahābhārata, the Hitopadeśa, the Pañcatantra, the so-called Cāṇakya's wise sayings, the Mānava-dharma-śāstra, etc.

82.1. It was proved that the N ī t i-K y a n[5] is the Burmese translation of the Pāli Lokanīti. In the Nīti-Kyan many verses (gāthā-s) are divided into two or four parts and therefore the number of wise sayings of the Nīti-Kyan is 211 instead of 167 found in the Lokanīti.

82.2. The Nīti-Kyan was translated in 1858 by E. Fowle[6] who wrote that this anthology was taught in the Burmese monasteries to the daily scholars and residents-novices; it was always in use and was generally known as being one of the elementary books in Burma, since it contained moral teachings, popular in India which could be applied in every day life.

83. In addition to this collection of subhāṣita-s of Sanskrit origin, there are three other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s also greatly influenced by Sanskrit subhāṣita-s. These are the Pāli Rājanīti, the Pāli Dhammanīti and the Pāli Lokasāra.

83.1. The Pāli Rājanīti is a typical Indian subhāṣita-saṁgraha, dealing—as its title shows—with rājanīti ; it contains 136 wise sayings. According to J. Gray it was based on the Indian dharmaśāstra-s and was compiled by the Brāhmaṇa-s Anantañāṇa and Gaṇāmissaka. It does not seem to be correct to state that the Pāli Rājanīti was based on Indian dharmaśāstra-s ; it was rather based on sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, and in particular on one version of Cāṇakya's sayings, viz., the Cāṇakya-sāra-saṁgraha version. The first 20 wise sayings dealing with king's officials, their duties and qualifications and the group of wise sayings 48-55 were, no doubt, borrowed, either directly or indirectly, from Cāṇakya's collections of wise sayings ; the latter group follows almost word for word the Cāṇakya-sāra-saṁgraha version.[1]

83.2.1. The Pāli Dhammanīti is also a typical Indian subhāṣita-saṁgraha ; it contains 411 wise sayings (plus three introductory verses) and is divided into 24 sections dealing with the preceptor, scholarship, wisdom, knowledge, conversation, wealth, residence, dependence, friendship, the bad man, the good man, the powerful, women, sons, servants, the wise man, what should be done, what should be avoided, ornamentation, kings, ministration, two's, three's etc., miscellanea.[2]

83.2.2. The Dhammanīti contains a great number of Sanskrit subhāṣita-s, of which many are identical with the Pāli Lokanīti but, generally speaking, the Dhammanīti is more losely connected with Sanskrit sources than the Pāli Rājanīti and, particularly, the Pāli Lokanīti. The wise sayings of the Dhammanīti are seldom straight translations of Sanskrit wise sayings ; they are, rather paraphrases of Sanskrit subhāṣita-s.

83.2.3. The Pāli Dhammanīti is not as common in Burma as the Lokanīti, but is better known than the Pāli Rājanīti ; it never became a handbook of study in Burma and, being much longer than the Lokanīti and Rājanīti, was not so willingly recopied by scribes ; it also did not have the reputation of being originated in India, though it is, at least in part, a translation or paraphrase of Sanskrit subhāṣita-s, particularly from the Hitopadeśa, Pañcatantra, other kathā-works, the Mahābhārata, the Mānava-dharmaśāstra, etc.[3]

87.1.1. The Sup'hasit of P'hraḥ Rūang exists in several editions.[1] Gerini translated 158 subhāṣita-s which show influence of Indian thinking, but are rather composed in the form of proverbs than subhāṣita-s.

88. E. Lorgeou in Bulletin de l'Athénée Oriental[2] translated in his "Suphasit Siamois" a number of Siāmese wise sayings ; some of them were influenced by Indian thinking and are written in the style of Sanskrit subhāṣita-s ; however some of these Siāmese wise sayings are quite different and are not of Indian origin. According to Lorgeou their origin is obscure ; they were collected in the beginning of the nineteenth century by a monk who lived in a monastery in Bangkok.

89. Gerini quoted also some other Siāmese sup'hasit-s, the most important of which are the P ū s ö n L ā n (The grandfather's teaching to his grandchild) and the L ā n s ö n P ū (The grandchild's teaching to his grandfather) ; they are probably of Lāo origin but were well-known in Siām. The National Library in Bangkok has registered in its catalogue these two works in T'ai verse and the Pū sön Lān also in Sanskrit verse (sic !). Unfortunately these two works, despite long search, could not be found in the Library when I visited Bangkok in 1961 and consequently could not be analyzed by me. Since the Pū sön Lān was written in Sanskrit verse it may be surmised that it was also known in India and be of Indian origin. Probably then the same applies to Lān sön Pū. One text of Pū sön Lān in the National Library in Bangkok is a work of Xieng Mai literature ; it is written on palm leaves.

90. L. Finot[3] mentioned also that two additional anthologies of wise sayings existed in Siām, viz., the P i p' h e k s ö n b ü t and the Pāli S ö n n ö n.[4] however they contain teachings from the Rāmāyaṇa (Vibhīṣaṇa's to his family and Bāli's to Sugrīva). Particularly the latter one is well-known in Siām. Though undoubtedly of Indian origin, these teachings are not subhāṣita-s par excellance.

91. The Siāmese proverbs and wise sayings which were collected by Gerini and Gühler[5] (Gerini collected 208[6] and Gühler 276) are, similarly as the P'hraḥ Rūang's maxims, short sentences and were probably of local origin, although some of the thoughts coincided with Western ideas.[1] Some of the wise sayings were of Indian origin ; that can be seen from the fact that they often refer to the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata and heroes of these two epics, as well as mention of Indian gods, in particular Garuḍa ; it seems also that they were influenced by the Pañcatantra and the Hitopadeśa tales, but most of them were adapted to the local daily life.

92. In the twentieth century the Sanskrit Vyāsa-subhāṣita-saṁgraha became also known in Siām as the V y ā k ā r a ś a t k a. It was probably brought from Ceylon during the reign of king Rāma III and printed[2] in Siāmese characters with the help of a Brāhmaṇa, Mukupusvāmi (?) and Luāng Phirivanahorn and then distributed at the cremation ceremony of Ammart Trī P'hra Turuparkpichorn.[3]

93. Also a collection of Cāṇakya's sayings the "Sanskrit C ā ṇ a k y a ś a t a k a"[4] is known in Siām ; it is registered in the catalogue of the National Library in Bangkok,[5] but could not be traced when I visited Bangkok in 1961.[6] Also under the auspices of the Royal Institute a translation of the Cāṇakya-śataka into Siāmese was prepared by P hraḥ P'hinic hevarnakar and was published in 1922[7] ; it is the text of the Cāṇakya-nīti-śāstra version.

F. Campā, Kanbujadeśa, Lāos

94. In "Further India", Hindū-s established two powerful colonial kingdoms—Campā and Kambujadeśa which comprised today's Cambodia, southern part of South Vietnam (old Cochin-china), part of Lāos and the southern part of today's Thailand.

95. Only in today's Cambodia it was possible to find one edition of the L o k a n ī t i in Pāli with a Cambodian translation. It is the Lokanīti Pakarana (for prakaraṇa) by Ven. Ouk Chea. Vacirannanbhavongs, Member of the Commission du Tripiṭaka à l'Institut Bouddhique de Phnom Penh.[1] It is not a complete edition of the Pāli Lokanīti ; it contains only 150 wise sayings, divided into 7 chapters of 36, 28, 11, 13, 18, 25 and 19 verses, respectively ; it omits particularly the wise sayings of the last chapter—miscellanea.

96. It was impossible to ascertain whether any other subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s of Sanskrit origin exist in this part of the world. The only additional information which was possible to secure, was to find a small publication of 26 pages in Pāli, in Khmer characters, with a Khmer translation entitled Rājanīti (for Rājanīti), texte tiré de Sastras (for śāstra-s) sur feuilles de latanier...Première édition. Phnom Penh. Editions de la Bibliothèque Royale, 1941 ; it contains political wise sayings in Pāli based on Sanskrit sources.

97. Another publication is the Sup'hasit ebāp srī, Bāky kāby, Anāk Okña Suttant Prijā. Téṅ Ind. of which the title page in French reads "Bons Conseils (pour les femmes) (Poèsie) par Oknha Suttantrarije Ind." Douxisème édition. Phnom Penh. Editions de l'institut Bouddhique, 1951. The booklet contains 250 verses in Khmer, dealing in particular with the beauty and charm of women, modelled probably on Sanskrit kāvya works, in particular on the Amaruśataka.

98. L. Finot in his "Recherches de la littérature Laotienne"[2] referred to a Pāli Lokanīti which is known in Lāos ; it is composed of some 400 wise sayings[3] ; although not mentioned in the catalogue of the Royal Library in Luang Prabang it exists in the Vat That.[4]

99. L. Finot also referred to the Pū sōn Lān and the Lān sōn Pū manuals of "apophtegmatical love" held in the highest esteem "from Luang Prabang in the North to Ubon in the South" which were not only widely read but also learnt by heart.[5] The Lān sōn Pū was known to exist in Luang Prabang in manuscript form.[6]

100. L. Finot referred further to the publication of a series of Lāo adages of Xieng Mai (S u p' h a s i t L ā o X i e n) which however was not finished.[1]

101. In addition, among others, fifteen Lāo proverbs were recorded by E. G. Gerini,[2] eleven by W. Gühler[3], fifteen by P. Lévy[4] and twenty by P. S. Nginn[5]; they are of peasant, earthy type of everyday wisdom and only seldom show Indian influences.[6] However, the Laōtian Lokanīti is certainly, as other Lokanīti-s, of Indian origin.

102. My other endeavours in Cambodia, Lāos and Vietnam in 1961 and then in 1967 and 1968 to find there other sources of gnomic literature showing Indian influences were unsuccessful, particularly due to the lack of interest in this part of the world in older literatures. I am convinced, however, that many other subhāṣita-s of Sanskrit origin exist also there.

G. Java, Sumatra, Bali

103. The Hindū-s must have established political authority in Java by the beginning of the second century A. D. In Java there were several Hindū kingdoms; two of these called Cho-po and Ho-lo-tan by the Chinese, sent regular embassies to China in the fifth century A.D. The names of the kings of both these countries ended with "—varman", showing Indian influence. The first great Hindū empire was founded by the Śailendra dynasty in the eighth century A. D. With the Hindū acculturation came also the Sanskrit literature, including Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s. Particularly two subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, viz. the Sārasamuccaya and the Ślokāntara became very popular; both are well preserved.[7]

104.1. The Old Javanese S ā r a s a m u c c a y a was well known in Java and Bali, as the book of moral precepts collected from different Sanskrit three distinct treatises: (1) K ō ṅ S u p' h a s i t; (2) A ṇ a c a k T h a m m a c a k, a code of offences and punishment; anb (3) S a t t a h ā r d h a m m a, duties of an official. He gave five examples of these sayings, but none seems to be of Indian origin.

sources, mostly the Mahābhārata (Anuśāsana-, Ādi-, Udyoga-, Strī-, Śānti- and Aśvamedha-parvan-s), the Pañcatantra, the Hitopadeśa and the Mānava-dharmaśāstra. It was first noticed by Dr. Friedrich in 1849; and then by H. H. Juynboll who published 117 of the wise sayings included in this anthology; it contains 517 wise sayings and, as C. Hooykaas remarked[1], is the "best source for Old Javanese literature hitherto known". Almost all subhāṣita-s included in this subhāṣita-saṁgraha could have been identified in Sanskrit sources[2]; out of 517 wise sayings quoted in this anthology 332 (or two-thirds) were borrowed from, or were influenced by, the Mahābhārata, sixty wise sayings occur in various collections of Cāṇakya's sayings, 33 occur in the Pañcatantra, 30 in the Garuḍa-purāṇa, 20 in the Hitopadeśa, 24 in the Mānava-dharmaśāstra; also a number of wise sayings appear in various smṛti-s and in other works of Sanskrit literature, not to mention subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, such as the Subhāṣita-ratna-bhāṇḍāgāra, the Subhāṣitāvalī of Vallabhadeva, the Śārṅgadharapaddhati, the Sūktiratnahāra and many others.[3]

104.2. The Sārasamuccaya was edited in the Śata-piṭaka-Series, No. 24 in Delhi in 1962. Its collator is V a r a r u c i who in the introduction stated that he collected "all the essentials of the Mahābhārata, the composition of His reverence Vyāsa" to whom he paid homage. In the explanation to the sixth verse Vararuci, referring to himself wrote: "henceforth he will say what is best in this Bhārata epic. It is designated Sārasamuccaya; sāra signifies essence and samuccaya is its accumulation." Therefore Raghu Vira who translated the whole work and wrote a preface to it remarked: "The Sārasamuccaya is the Gītā of the Balinese Hindū-s. As designed by its author Vararuci, it contains the essence of the high teachings and noble ideas set forth in the Mahābhārata."

104.3. On the basis of the edition of the Sārasamuccaya in the Śata-piṭaka-Series and additional two lontars (which do not contain any important variants) Tjokorda Rai Sudharta published in mimeographed form the first 255 verses of the Sārasamuccaya in Sanskrit and Old Javanese transcriptions as well as the Indonesian translation of the Old Javanese text; it appeared in the Parisada Hindu Dharma Pusat in Denpasar (Bali) 1968. The whole Sārasamuccaya so edited and translated was expected to appear in printed form in 1972, but did not appear yet.

3. Obviously some Subhāṣita-s occur in more than one primary source.

105.1. The existence of the Old Javanese Ś l o k ā n t a r a was known for a very long time[1]; it was however brought to light in a critical edition only in 1957; it was then published in the International Academy of Indian Culture and critically edited by Sharada Rani.[2]

105.2. The Ślokāntara contains 83 sayings which are followed by an Old Javanese prose-explanation which, as its editor stated, "though usually close to the origianl stanza, is at times quite prolix. This style of exposition is still to be seen in India, where the religious preachers and purāṇic narrators explain the Sanskrit śloka-s and further elaborate them by their own explanations.[3]" Ślokāntara verses, similarly as Ceylonese Pratyayaśataka verses, contain often paraphrases of known Subhāṣita-s.[4]

105.3. The Ślokāntra does not correspond "to the nīti-text of Sanskrit literature", as Sharada Rani suggested; it is somewhat an unusual text of a subhāṣita-saṁgraha because of the preponderance of purely dharmaśāstra verses; such verses are sometimes included in subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s, but never occupy as much as one-fourth of the whole subhāṣita-saṁgraha, as is the case of the Ślokāntara. Otherwise, however, it can be considered as a subhāṣita-saṁgraha. If we do not count some twenty verses, which are dharmaśāstra verses, half of the rest, i.e., 27 verses are of Cāṇakya origin or were influenced by the so-called Cāṇakya's sayings.

105.4. The importance of the Ślokāntara, similarly as the importance of the Sārasamuccaya, is enhanced by the preservation of "lost" texts; the Ślokāntara contains the same "lost" Mānava-dharmaśāstra verse which we find in the Sārasamuccaya,[5] as well as an additional "lost" Mānava-dharmaśāstra verse.[6]

2. Dvīpāntara-Piṭaka, vol. 2, International Academy of Indian Culture, Delhi. The edition is divided into three parts : the first contains the text in transcription; the second the English translation; and the third the text with extensive notes. It also contains a preface and an Index of "new and notable words".

3. Introduction, p. 5.

4. Cf. para 79.2.

5. Ślokāntara 1=Sārasamuccaya 136.

6. Ślokāntara, verse 30. The first "lost" Mānava-dhasmaśastra verse appears in V. N. Mandlik's edition of the Mānava-dharmaśāstra after VIII. 82 (p. 929), the second appears also exclusively in V. N. Mandlik's edition after VIII. 102 (p. 934); both verses are often quoted in nibandha-s (cf. L. Sternbach, op. cit. (fn. 2 on p. clviii) : paras 14 and 19).

106.1. Less popular, but also important is the Old Javenese N ī t i-ś ā s t r a of N ī t i s ā r a,[1] composed, according to Dr. Poerbatjaraka the editor of this Old Javanese subhāṣita-saṁgraha, in the last years of Mahapahit[2]; it contains 120 verses in fifteen chapters.

106.2. Dr. C. Hooykaas was of the opinion that the Old Javanese Nītiśāstra gave the impression of being purely Indian in origin. The garb, however, in which the maxims have been clad, though also of Indian origin, did not favour exact translation ; its metres must at times have driven the poet to some abbreviations, at other times to enlargements and additions. He also very rightly concluded that it was doubtful whether it would be possible to detect one definite treatise as a source ; the Javanese may only have rearranged the contents of the work, but also may have omitted from or/and added to it ; the work may also have been an anthology from the very beginning. U. N. Ghoshal characterised it as "a collection of wise sayings, moral precepts and so forth of the Cāṇakya-nīti-class".[3]

106.3. It seems that it would have been better to characterise this work as an Old Javanese subhāṣita-saṁgraha, since many of those sayings which could be identified are found exclusively in some Sanskrit subhāṣita-saṁgraha-s and not in primary sources. This anthology might have been, as Dr. C. Hooykaas suggested, a work rearranged by a Javanese compiler with omissions or additions ; it must be added, however, that it is far from a purely Sanskritized text ; the wise sayings are, generally speaking, not translations of the Sanskrit text into Old Javanese but a paraphrase of the Sanskrit sayings written very often in corrupt Sanskrit.[4]

106.4. A great number of subhāṣita-s included in this anthology are so-called Cāṇakya's sayings ; many other subhāṣita-s originated in the Mānavadharmaśāstra, the Rāmāyaṇa, the Pañcatantra, the Mahābhārata, the Hitopadeśa and other Sanskrit sources.

107.1. Also the Pañcatantra with many of its subhāṣita-s became very popular in Java, Bali and Madura ; it was known there as T a n t r i K ā m a n d a k a ; it is quite different from most of the versions of the Pañcatantra ; it seems to be nearest to the Pañcatantra of Durgasiṁha[1]. We find in this part of the world at least twelve different recensions of the Pañcatantra, of which the oldest three are written in a sort of Old Javanese, several in Middle Javanese and Balinese, two in New Javanese and two others in Madurese.[2]

107.2. The best text of the Old Javanese Tantri Kāmandaka was edited and translated by C. Hooykaas[3]. The Old Javanese text, written in prose with some added verses, which are mostly subhāṣita-s, contains only 83 such verses[4], not all of which can be found in the different texts of the Pañcatantra ; most of those verses which could not be traced to the Sanskrit Pañcatantra could be found in the Mahābhārata, Bhartṛhari's Śataka-s, or among wise sayings attributed to Cāṇakya.

108. Also the Udyoga-Bhīṣma-parvan-s of the Mahābhārata which contains a great number of wise sayings were known well in Old Javanese ; so also was the Ādi-parvan.[5]

109. It is well-known that many Indian fables—with hundreds of inserted nīti-sayings—were incorporated into the literatures not only to the East of India but also to the West of India. The Pañcatantra, for instance, became known not only in the whole of South-East Asia, but was also translated into Pehlevi by A.D. 570 ; this text was then translated into Old Syriac and old Arabic, as the Kalīlah wa-Dimna (later called also the fables of Bidjpai). The text spread through Hebrew, Greek and other translations such as of Rabbi Joël, Symeon Seth, Giulio Nutti, Johannes di Capua, A. von Pforr, Abu'l Maāli Nushrallāh ibn Muḥammad ibn Abdul Ḥamīd, Anwāri Suhaili, etc. to the West of India. The Hitopadeśa has been known in the West for a very long time ; a translation of this collection of fables was already made into English in 1787 and from then into most European languages. The Śukasaptati served as the basis for the 14th century Nakshabi version of the Persian Ṭūṭī-nameh and the 17th century version of Muḥammad Qadiri ; it spread then to Turkey as the Turkish version of the Ṭūṭī-nameh with additions from the Vetālapañcaviṁśatikā. Motifs of the Śukasaptati are found in the 'Arabian Thousand and One Nights' and particularly in the Kitāb el-Sindbād and even in Gottfried's Tristan und Isolde, not to mention many translations of Śukasaptati into European languages. The Vikramacarita was not only translated into Newārī and as Sib-songliang into Siāmese but also in 1574 by order of the Emperor Akbar into Persian. By name of Arji-Borji Chan (Rāja Bhoja) it was absorbed into the Tibetan and the Mongolian literatures. Also translations, though of a later date, were made into European languages. Finally the Vetālapañcaviṁśatikā was early translated into Newāri, Tibetan and Mongolian-Kalmuck, and through Braj-bhāṣā, Hindī and other modern Indian languages has greatly influenced under the name Baitālpachīsī, particularly in the nineteeth century, the English literature with Richard Burton's Vikram and the Vampire, or Tales of Hindu Devilry. It also became partly known in Turkey through the Turkish version of Nakshabi's Ṭūṭī Nameh, where some stories of the Vetālapañcaviṁśatikā were also incorporated. In this way, that is through translations into foreign languages the Sanskrit kathā-literature, which is full of nīti-sayings, became widely known not only in the East but also in the West and were often quoted in Europe.

110. Some Sanskrit nīti-sayings were also included in the Old and New Testament. For instance Mahābhārata's subhāṣita-s such as "You see the faults of others even if they are as small as a grain of mustard, but you do not want to see your own faults even if they are as big as the bilva-fruit' (MBh. 1.69.1) are found in St. Mathews 7.3 and in the Talmud 'Arakhin 16 ; or the Mahābhārata subhāṣita "Do not do to others what is disagreeable to yourself : that is dharma ; the other proceeds from desire" (MBh. 5.39. 57) is found in St. Mathews 7.12, St. Luke 6.31 and in the Rabbi Hillel's dictum ; or the saying (nyāya) of the Mahābhārata "do not react evil with evil" (MBh. 3.198.43) and "whatever one has sown that one reaps" (MBh. 12.287.44) are also found respectively in the Epistle of Paul, the Apostle to the Romans, (12.17) and in the Epistle of Paul, the Appostle to the Galatians, (6.7) ; and in many others. It must, however, be emphasised that the ascriptions of these maxims to Sanskrit texts should be made with great care for they may belong to the floating mass of oral tradition being the property of the whole of mankind.[1]

111. Undoubtedly many more collections of nīti-sayings of Sanskrit origin exist in 'Greater India' but with so many works still burried in the various lands of South-East Asia and difficulties in getting the needed information, it is impossible to ascertain the existence of other treasures of Sanskrit nīti-literature which spread over 'Greater India'. It is certain that with the progress of Indian studies in 'Greater India' this important branch of Sanskrit literature will become better known in the nearest future.

Dear my friend, this raven darkness within the Nikuñja envelopes all round like a sable mantle, and as it were, hugs the wantons close as they stealthily approach their gay paramours. And, like a gallant, the Darkness paints the lashes of the wantons ebon with collyrium, adorns their ears with the dark sprays of the tamāla, bedecks their locks with wreaths of dark-blue lilies, lays on their bosoms the black unguent concocted of musk —in short, so wraps them up in its folds that they are rendered totally invisible to curious prying eyes! (S. Lakshminarasimha Sastri's translation).

Fire is a great power in the world. It remains hid in the wood. It never uses (consumes) that wood until it is kindled by others.

Indeed that very fire, as kindled by the rubbing together [friction] of trees, burns up quickly by its power [energy] the very wood wherein it lay hid, the entire forest and everything else (in and close to it).

Verily thus are the highborn possessed of energy like unto that of fire. Patient and formless, they remain like fire in the wood (P. N. Menon's translation).

It is quite true that a moth throws itself down into the burning flame of a lamp, and a fish devours the meat of deadly bait attached to the fishing hook, but we must admit, that both the moth and the fish are entirely ignorant of the fact that this step of theirs will lead to their utter destruction. Whereas, on the contrary, we human beings cannot give up the temptations of sensual pleasures, notwithstanding the fact, that we are fully conscious of their being the inextricable snares of all our calamities and misfortunes, in the world ! The influence of worldly delusion is, no doubt, tremendously great and mysterious. (P. G. Nath's translation).

The hungry serpent of Lord Śiva desires to eat the mouse (the vehicle) of Lord Gaṇeśa, and him (the serpent) the peacock (the vehicle) of Lord Kumāra. The lion (the vehicle) of the goddess Pārvatī (desires to eat) that eater of serpents. If such is the state of affairs in the household of Lord Śiva himself, why should it not be found elsewhere in the world ? For such is the law of nature. (A.A.R.).

I am still unable to decide whether she is a Pārvatī, the consort of Śiva, or Urvaśī, (who had become) the victim of curse from the Lord of Gods, or Kṛṣṇa's Lakṣmī ? Or was she, by the Creator, created to make the world mad, or was it that the Lord Himself wanted to see the jewel among women ? (S. N. Tadpatrikar's translation).

A Brāhmaṇa should study, offer sacrifices, make charities, and sojourn to the best of all holy places on the earth; he should teach, minister as a priest in sacrifices offered by others worthy of such help, and accept gifts from persons who are known. Similarly a Kṣatriya should protect the people in accordance with the injunctions of the law, diligently practice the virtue of charity, offer sacrifices, study the whole Veda, take a wife, and lead a virtuous householder's life. (If possessed of a virtuous soul, and if he practises the holy virtues, he may easily attain the region of the supreme Being.) "A Vaiśya should study, and diligently earn and accumulate wealth by means of commerce, agriculture and the tending of cattle. He should so act as to please the Brāhmaṇa-s and Kṣatriya-s, be virtuous, do good works, and be a householder." The following are the duties declared for Śūdra-s from the olden times. He should serve the Brāhmaṇa-s and submit to them; should not study; sacrifices are forbidden to him, he should be diligent and constantly enterprising in doing all that is for his good. (P. C. Roy's translation of MBh (R)).

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

On the occasion of the issuance of the Second Volume of my Mahā-subhāṣita-saṁgraha, I wish to remember once more my scholar-friend, the late lamented Acharya Dr. Vishva Bandhu Shastri, former Joint Secretary and Director of the Vishveshvaranand Vedic Research Institute, who accepted this project of mine for publication by the Institute. I take this opportunity to express my sincerest thanks to the Management of the Institute for publishing it in the Vishveshvaranand Indological Research Series.

My most whole-hearted thanks and words of appreciation go to Shri S. Bhaskaran Nair, Deputy Director of the said Institute and the General Editor of its Research Series, who edited the present volume to my entire satisfaction. During the editorial processing he has carefully gone through the whole work, and has been making extra-corrections and additions with regard to the Sanskrit text, Notes, Metre, Translation and Indices. On several instances he had himself to emend and translate doubtful verses. He has also made numerous scholarly suggestions which were always useful and which I, consequently, accepted, readily. Towards the latter part of this volume, when, on account of my eye-operations, I was unable to correct the proofs myself he has attended to this strenuous work also, on my behalf. I wish to place on record my never-to-be-forgotten gratitude to Shri Nair for his attending to all these matters, which he performed with self-abnegation and devotion.

My thanks are also due to Shri Om Prakash Sharma and Shri Raj Kumar Parashar of the V. V. R. Institute, who assisted the Editor in reading the proofs of the indexical portion.
